You are feeling depressed, your appetite is poor, you are troubled with headache, you are fidgetty, nervous, and generally out of sorts, and want to brace up. Brace up, but not with stimulants, spring medicines, or bitters, which have for their basis very strong, bad whiskey, and which stimulate you for an hour, and then leave you in worse condition than before. What you want is an alterative that will purify your blood, start healthy action of liver and kidneys, restore your vitality, and give renewed health and strength. Such a medicine you will find in Electric Bitters, and only 50 cents a bottle at Dr. G. W. Crouter's drug store. 3

The First Sign

Of failing health, whether in the form of Night Sweats and Nervousness, or in a sense of General Weariness and Loss of Appetite, should suggest the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This preparation is most effective for giving tone and strength to the enfeebled system, promoting the digestion and assimilation of food, restoring the nervous forces to their normal condition, and for purifying, enriching, and vitalizing the blood.

Failing Health.

Ten years ago my health began to fail. I was troubled with a distressing Cough, Night Sweats, Weakness, and Nervousness. I tried various remedies prescribed by different physicians, but became so weak that I could not go up stairs without stopping to rest. My physician recommended me to try Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which I did, and I am now as healthy and strong as ever.—Mrs. E. L. Williams, Alexandria, Minn.

I have used Ayer's Sarsaparilla, in my family, for Scrofula, and know, if it is taken faithfully, that it will thoroughly eradicate the terrible disease. I have also prescribed it as a tonic, as well as an alterative, and must say that I honestly believe it to be the best blood medicine ever compounded.—W. F. Fowler, D. D. S., M. D., Greenville, Tenn.

Dyspepsia Cured.

It would be impossible for me to describe what I suffered from Indigestion and Headache up to the time I began taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. I was under the care of various physicians all the time, and yet I grew worse and worse. I at last despaired of ever obtaining relief. After taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla for a short time, my headache disappeared, and my stomach performed its duties more perfectly. Today my health is completely restored.—Mary Harley, Springfield, Mass.

I have been greatly benefited by the prompt use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It tones and invigorates the system, regulates the action of the digestive and assimilative organs, and vitalizes the blood. It is without doubt, the most reliable blood purifier yet discovered.—H. D. Johnson, 383 Atlantic ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

TEN YEARS AGO, on December 26th, 1875, The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS was founded. It was the pioneer of low-priced journalism in the west. From the first the controlling conviction of its managers has been that a "cheap paper" should be cheap only in price; that its news should be as fresh and complete, its editorial discussion as able, and its general tone and character as pure and healthful as its best and highest-priced contemporary. This has been its ideal. How well it has succeeded in the actual attainment of so high a standard is best evidenced in the fact that it now regularly prints and sells over 150,000 papers a day,—a larger circulation than that of all other Chicago dailies combined.

The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is an INDEPENDENT newspaper. It is not partisan. Neither is it a neutral. It is a paper of positive opinion, expressed without fear or favor. It seeks the patronage of people who love country more than party.

The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is the only 2 cent paper in the west that is a member of the Associated Press. It prints ALL THE NEWS.

Sold by all news dealers at two cents per copy. Mailed to any address, postage prepaid, for six dollars per year, or for a shorter term at rate of fifty cents per month. Address Victor F. Lawson, Publisher The DAILY NEWS, 123 Fifth Ave., CHICAGO, ILL.

The CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS—8 pages, 64 columns—is the largest dollar weekly in America.

"The Charlevoix JOURNAL contained a ten-column article on the business of the proprietor Champlain in Lake Michigan. It shows the enterprise of that paper."—Claro Democrat.

A picture of the Champlain while on fire surrounded by the blackest night, painted by F. Lubow, exhibited in Geo. Miller's front window elicits much favorable comment.

Rev. J. J. Kanagy has been retained as pastor of the Congregational church at Vandenbilt, Mich., for six months longer, but at present he is at home on a short vacation.

Harmon H. Himebaugh, of Marion, and Miss Mary J. Buller, of Charlevoix, were married in the village of Boyne City, on the evening of June 29th, by Rev. C. F. Van Auken.

Frank D. Phillips, of Port Huron, is in town making arrangements for permanent location here. He expects to engage in the manufacture of cigars, and will probably employ a dozen men when he gets settled.

A. D. Cruickshank, G. W. Crouter, F. W. Mayne, Dr. Preston, Frank Wood, and W. A. Brown assisted the Grand Chief Patriarch in instituting an encampment I. O. O. F. at Mancelona last week, of twenty-three members.

Children's day was celebrated by the Sabbath School at Bisek's school house, last Sabbath, and although the day was unpropitious, a large attendance was good. The exercises were entered into with their accustomed zeal, every part was well performed, and did credit to every one participating.

The Central Lake correspondent of the Bellaire Breeze says: "A majority of the land owners in this vicinity have expressed themselves as ready to grant the D. C. & S. railroad right of way through their property, and we are anxious to see the rest fall into line."

The railroad surveyors have succeeded in finding a good route from Charlevoix to Kalkaska, having arrived at the last named place the fore part of the week. They returned to Charlevoix Wednesday to prepare a statement showing the cost of constructing the road as far as already surveyed, and will then go on and complete the survey to Grayling.—Bellaire Breeze.

Next Tuesday the Cummings will adopt a new schedule which will be advantageous to the people of Charlevoix. She will leave Charlevoix at 7 o'clock in the morning and connect at Petoskey with the morning train south, returning to Charlevoix before noon. In the afternoon she leaves Charlevoix at 2 o'clock; returning leaves Petoskey at 5, after the arrival of the day train from the south.

A special newspaper train has been put on the G. R. & I. railroad, leaving Grand Rapids every Saturday night at 12.30, arriving at Petoskey about 8 o'clock Sunday morning. If Charlevoix is to have advantage of this and receive Sunday morning papers on Sunday, arrangements will have to be made for bringing them from Petoskey here, as the government contract does not include Sunday.

At a recent meeting of the executive board of the Charlevoix resort association, held at Kalamazoo, it was decided not to connect the Belvedere house with the telephone exchange. This seems to be a strange action for the association to take, considering that this resort is fully a half mile from the central office. We are informed that the Belvedere is the only resort hotel in the Traverse region not connected with the telephone system.

The people of Petoskey have reason to congratulate themselves in securing as a permanent resident C. S. Hampton and the Independent, as Mr. Hampton is a genuine pusher, and is now working for the interest of Petoskey as he has always worked for Harbor Springs. Last week he took up Petoskey's public schools, and in a four column article gave a history of its organization and progress in an able and instructive manner, with a cut of the school building and of Prof. Ewing, principal. Although Petoskey had two good newspapers there seems to be room for the Independent.

"Wm. C. Graves, who has for some months ably filled the position of city editor on the staff of the State Republican, leaves to-night for Detroit where he assumes an important position on the Tribune. Mr. Graves is a genial young fellow, a promising young journalist, and leaves many friends here who will watch his upward career in his chosen field with great interest.—Lansing Journal.

Engineer John McCaffrey and fireman Wm. Cameron, late of the Champlain, took passage on the Lawrence this morning. McCaffrey in company with his mother, who has been with him about two weeks, will go to their home in Manistee. Lycomb will go to the marine hospital in Chicago. Although these men are in a fair way of recovery, and seem to be doing well, it will be some time before they will be free of pain from their severe burns.

Coming Events.

Remember the gospel meeting at the opera house Sunday evening.

J. S. Smithson will give a gospel address at Hilton school house, at 11 o'clock, Sunday, July 10th.

There will be preaching at the Ironton M. E. church next Sabbath, morning and evening, by the pastor.

Rev. J. S. Parmelee, of Wilmington, Del., will occupy the Congregational pulpit next Sunday morning, at the usual hour.

Services in memory of Mrs. B. Suffield will be held at the Congregational church next Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. Three papers will be read, giving some of the social work of this woman while with us. Mrs. H. S. Harsha, "The Church;" Prof. Enos, "The Sunday School;" and Mrs. C. Y. Cook, "The Temperance Cause."

The state pharmaceutical association hold their annual meeting in Petoskey the 12th, 13th, and 14th of this month. On the 14th an excursion will be had to Charlevoix on the steamer Grand Rapids. The meeting of this association at Petoskey, as well as the excursion to Charlevoix, is due to the efforts of Dr. Crouter, who not only made the motion, but stayed by it until the point was carried.

The Celebration.

In spite of the heavy appearance of the weather Monday morning and the fact that it rained most of the forenoon, the town was full of people. The celebration had been well advertised, and the people from the country started for town early. The Pine Lake boats all brought crowds, and some of them made a second trip to accommodate passengers.

On account of the rain the program of the day could not be carried out fully. The marching of Baxter Post, G. A. R., was in the usual good order. The fire department in parade and drill, did handsomely, making the "stretch in" and connection in 32 seconds, which is very quick time considering the mud the boys were wading through. One of the interesting features of the day was the exhibition given by the "Mossbacks," which for half an hour kept the crowd in convulsions of laughter.

The exhibition given by Mr. Dodds in his diving suit is said to have been a novel affair, but as it took place an hour before it was advertised, many were disappointed in not being present.

In the afternoon the clouds cleared away and the sun came out. Attention was then given to the game of ball which in some respects was a fair game, but was so one sided that much of the interest was lost.

The fire-fly fleet in the evening was witnessed by hundreds of people from the shore.

Eveline.

A pleasant shower Sunday.

Which had the best for Monday.

We had green peas and string beans for the fourth.

Joseph Tuttle spent his fourth in Mancelona.

We are informed that Miss Mary Friel is quite ill.

J. M. Harris left Monday morning for Charlevoix, where he has accepted a position as clerk in the drug store of G. W. Crouter at that place through the vacation.

Mead Benson sold his ox team to Mr. Haight, of Dwight.

Fireworks at the fourth, but the boats that passed were loaded, and every body reports having a good time.

Frank May, of Boyne Falls, made us a very pleasant visit Saturday and Sunday.

Last Friday the schools at Ironton closed after a successful term by J. M. Harris and Mrs. Pope as teachers. The closing exercises were in connection with a basket picnic, which was largely attended, and a very enjoyable time is reported. Your correspondent was unable to attend on account of sickness. There will be a mouth vacation.

A stabbing affair occurred in our town last Thursday that came near depriving us of a citizen. William Henry, while returning from Boyne City, got into an altercation with Lew Brown, which led from hard words to hard blows, and when they were separated Henry was found to be quite severely wounded, having upon his body twenty-eight cuts, six of which are quite deep. The altercation it is said, grew out of a lawsuit at Boyne City during the day, in which the parties were witnesses, but as near as the facts can be gathered, both parties were under the influence of liquor at the time, and that was probably the cause of the affair. Mr. Henry seems to be doing well and will probably recover in time.

South Hayes.

Beautiful hay weather.

A box social was held at the Hop Yard school house Friday evening. A good time is reported in spite of the rain. The proceeds went to buy lamps for the school house.

Mr. Arnold, of Susan Lake, brought three ribs one day last week, but is recovering.

Mrs. Ackert, who has been away visiting her mother for about two months, has returned home.

The rain on the Fourth put an end to all enjoyment that day for some.

Bertha Ackert is visiting her sister, Mary Ackert, near East Jordan this week.

Mr. S. Martin cut his foot quite badly, Sunday, on a scythe.

Mr. Grant Crandall, of Mancelona, spent the fourth with his aunt, Mrs. S. Martin.

Mrs. H. Hopkins, who has been on a trip around the lake with her husband has returned home.

There's a creature that talks just to hear his voice sound,
And who puts one in fidgets whenever he's around—
He's a chronic old chatter, who stuffs up my ears
As I endeavor to a single idea.

He will reel off his pals on a subject so cold
That the life of his phrases seems buried in
And continues the strain along year after year
While he wears me all out with his single idea.

He's a nuisance to meet when you've not for a
For he never lets you go when he's had out his talk,
And the people who pass you will look up to Lest
His infernal cheap din with a single idea.

He is known to each reader—this chattering
Who, with hobby, will greet you in street-car or
With sorry yawps and big words that send queer,
Will wheedle long on his single idea.

When to heaven (?) he soars, there is ambush for him
Lest he tackle spirits who come to the gate,
Then he'll chatter and chin till he's sent to the
Where he can't burn the old bore and his single idea.

A TALE OF '53.

BY FRANK J. MARTIN.

"The Yellow Girl," one of the palatial steamers on the Southwestern line, rolled into One Horse Corners one fine afternoon in the month of June, in the year of grace 1853. Old Bill Rose was hobbling about the deck for days. Bill was a jolly fellow, with a heart in his pants, and a double storage capacity for pure whisky. On this particular day Bill had imbibed very freely, and was not very sorry that he had lost one passenger and that on booked for One-Horse Gap. His passenger was a tall, well-built young man, about twenty-five, and good-looking.

Tom Fate, the proprietor of the Hotel Europe, was standing in the doorway of his hotel anxiously waiting for the Yellow Girl to appear in the bend of the road about a mile below. On the veranda, near by, sat a man clothed in a miner's garb and smoking contentedly, but stopping a to-bacco for the stage. When the stage drew up at the door the man disappeared behind the hotel, while the young fellow handed his guest and took care of his luggage.

The young stranger registered as Walter Paine, of San Francisco, and asked to be shown to his room at once. When the landlord left his room he drew from his pocket a copy of the New York Tribune and read the following:

"The body of the young lady that was picked up in the East River last Friday has been identified as being that of Miss Louise Ballard. The friends of the young woman say that she was betrayed by a young wealthy miner from California, and that from the day he deserted her she showed unmistakable evidences of insanity. It is more than probable that, driven to madness by her shame, she sought relief in the cool waters of the East River."

The young man read the article, then re read and reread the article. Then he drew from his pocket another packet containing a photograph and letter. He studied it a photograph for some time, and then read the letter. It ran as follows:

"NEW YORK, May 30, 1853.

"DEAR WALTER: Your idea is good one. Enclosed find the photograph I promised you. I found it in Lu's trunk. Keep a sharp lookout, and if you get a clue follow it to the end. It will meet you at the appointed place on time.

"ELEANOR."

It took several minutes for him to get calm, so excited had he become. But as he had returned the paper and envelope to his pocket, the landlord tapped on the door and inquired if his guest desired any supper. He claimed that he had been called to him from the foot of the stairs for several minutes and had obtained no reply. The young stranger apologized and assured him he was not pretty hungry, whereupon they both repaired to the dining room.

Tom Fate, the proprietor of the Hotel Europe, took no a great pain in the management of his establishment. So active was it, indeed, that he filled the positions of day and night clerk, porter and head waiter. He would have been jail-bird if there had been a jail in One-Horse Gap. It is unnecessary to remark that the Hotel Europe was not overcrowded with guests at any time. The two now under its roof were the first ones in three weeks. The man who had been sitting on the veranda was a great and had been there for several days. His name, or at least the one he gave, was Tom Whittlely, and he was a miner returning to California after enjoying a big spree in New York.

When Tom Fate entered the dining room he introduced his two guests to each other and then began to serve up supper in an elaborate style—that is, on the dishes.

Walter Paine ate but little supper that evening, for between studying the features of Whittlely and interesting himself in the struggle for supremacy between the flies and the butter, he lost his appetite. The former affair had much food for mental digestion, while the struggle between the two most powerful enemies in the Hotel Europe settled all his cravings for food.

Supper over, the two guests repaired to the "office," and procuring cigars they fell into a friendly chat. Tom Whittlely began to narrate some of the stormy stories of his life. He swung it up and down many little things that were highly interesting to Walter. Walter said but little until he had heard about all he could expect to. Then he began, and for two hours kept the two Tomes busy laughing at his witty sayings and funky stories.

So matters drifted along until late in the night, when Tom Whittlely said that he had made up his mind to start out for Rich Find with a load of grain the next morning, as an accommodation for a friend of his, who was sick and could not go. Walter asked what was the distance to Rich Find, and he would not like a partner on the road. Being told that it would take two days ride, and over a rough road at that, he said that he could go along if he wished to, he ardily assented to undergo all the fatigues. And well he might. Accordingly, he completed all the arrangements necessary and retired to his room.

Once again he took out and free from notice, he took a good look at the photograph, as if to make sure of what he was about to do. Then he procured a sheet of paper and by the dim, flickering light of a candle penned the following:

"NEW YORK HOTEL, June 30, 1853.

"ALBERT HALLARD, St. James Hotel, St. Louis:

"I have hit. We go to Sacramento.

"WALTER."

Then he inclosed the note in an envelope, wrote the superscription and sat down to think.

Bill Keets had told him that there was another stage road five miles south of Hoss Gap, and that the east-bound stage would pass along about one o'clock that night. That if he wanted to get a letter on it he would have to go a mile east on the road to Dandy Gap, where the stage stopped. That would be six miles altogether. It was then half-past eleven and he would have to be moving. So putting on his hat he walked down stairs and out without attracting attention, and was soon speeding along to Dandy Gap.

It was nearly three hours when he returned. His trip must have proved satisfactory to him, for he looked more contented than he had since he slipped into the hotel that afternoon. He stole up to his room and was soon sound asleep.

At five o'clock the inmates of the establishment were astir, and at a quarter past six the great grain wagon, pulled by four white horses and manned by Tom and Walter, rolled away from One-Horse Gap. The first ten miles afforded pleasant riding and fine scenery. The two men talked in friendly way, but Walter was very grave in his speech.

The road began to grow rough and rocky and the journey tiresome. The conversation was dropped and strict attention paid to the horses. Once or twice the wagon came near being upset by the huge rocks that lined each side of the trail. For a stretch the trail was clear and they fell to talking again. They had gone along for a short distance when the wagon gave a sudden plunge as if they were tossed high in the air. Tom landed safely on the seat, while Walter fell between the wheels. The wagon righted itself, the horses started again, and before a couple of minutes had passed Walter felt the wheel crush his right leg.

The pain was intense, and he swooned away. How long he remained in that condition he could not tell, for when he recovered his senses fair Luna was shedding her mellow rays on his mangled form stretched there between two great rocks. It was some time before he could recall where he was. He raised his head a little and looked down the road. There was the wagon and all were gone. He felt for his papers and photograph. The latter were gone. Moreover, his pockets had been rifled. By whom? He remembered Tom Whittlely, who, when finding him unconscious from his injury, went through his pockets, and finding his own photograph and the paper and letter already mentioned, resolved to let his partner die of pain and starvation. Such was that desolate mountain trail.

Walter endeavored to get on his feet. He had almost succeeded, when he fell back, exhausted on a sharp rock and he was unconscious.

The hours of night sped on; then came the dawn; the sun rose high in the heavens and cast its burning rays on the unprotected face of the unfortunate young man. In the morning and noon of that day he had been delirious, and a violent fever had begun its work. The only thing that broke the solemn stillness of the day was the moaning and raving of the unfortunate.

Night come came and went. The sun was just settling down behind the great Sierras when the rumble of a wagon was heard in the distance. Faster and more distinct became the rumble, until at length the white top of an emigrant's wagon might be seeing creeping down the trail. An old-fashioned man was driving the oxen, while his wife sat sewing on the front seat. In the rear of the wagon sat their daughter, a buxom young lady dressed in a far from elegant costume. In her poke bonnet she had taken the place of her sire or dame. She was a perfect woman in face and form, or it did not require the aid of a microscope to see that at a glance.

Slowly the wagon jostled along until it was within a few yards of where Harry lay. The old man was chanting "Yankee Doodle," while the two women were talking. All three were soon startled by a moan. The wagon was stopped, and all listened. Low and again did they hear it. The third time the women jumped to the ground and began to search. See they once it was the moan of a human being. "Lucy, be careful, continued the old man as he the daughter jumped on rock and started on the search. She had not gone very far when she discovered Walter.

She called to her father and mother and they were soon at the spot. Walter was a pitiable sight. The sun had burned his face black, a deep gash was over his eyes, and his clothes were ragged and torn. Without the least hesitation or show they tenderly picked him up in their arms and carried him to a bed of blankets beside the wagon. Then all three set about to dress his wounds and bathe him.

They did not stop to think who was or how he came there. He needed assistance, and he got it in a humble though sincere way. His fractured limb was set, his hurts bandaged, and some restoratives applied to him.

Then another question arose. Their wagon was already overcrowded. They could not think of anything that would cause the young man any pain, so they quietly unloaded half their belongings and made room for Walter, so that when they started on the next morning he was resting on a comfortable bed.

Walter had fallen into good hands. Dan Snell was a good old Ohio farmer, and was on his way to the gold fields of California. His wife, a woman of good practical sense, made him an excellent mate, while his daughter Lucy was a combination of all the good qualities of both. She had secured a fair education in her native State, and was a good housekeeper. She was not a "Society" lady, but one of those women who can make home a place of solid comfort. But weeks later they rolled into Sacramento on a Sunday afternoon. Walter had recovered, and had told them his whole story. They believed him, and insisted on his remaining with them as long as he pleased. It was only on account of Lucy's pleadings that he had consented.

On the following morning Ben and Walter took a walk through the town. They had wandered about for an hour, when they entered a "saloon." When well out of the town their attention was attracted to a sight between an old man and a big, burly fellow. The latter had and looked on for a minute, then, uttering a curse, he drew his fist and reached at the big, burly fellow. The big fellow caught Walter's eye in time to save his own life for a few minutes at least. Walter Paine and Tom Whittlely stood face to face, ready for a fight to a finish. They understood each other now, and both knew it was a fight for life. Not a word was spoken. The old man, Walter and Ben were on one side and Whittlely with two friends on the other. In six seconds the six men were in a rapid fortit to behold. It was a fight to do, and justice won. In five minutes wagon sat their daughter, a buxom young lady dressed in a far from elegant costume. In her poke bonnet she had taken the place of her sire or dame. She was a perfect woman in face and form, or it did not require the aid of a microscope to see that at a glance to advantage.

Slowly the wagon jostled along until it was within a few yards of where Harry lay. The old man was chanting "Yankee Doodle," while the two women were talking. All three were soon startled by a moan. The wagon was stopped, and all listened. Low and again did they hear it. The third time the women jumped to the ground and began to search. See they once it was the moan of a human being. "Lucy, be careful, continued the old man as he the daughter jumped on rock and started on the search. She had not gone very far when she discovered Walter.

She called to her father and mother and they were soon at the spot. Walter was a pitiable sight. The sun had burned his face black, a deep gash was over his eyes, and his clothes were ragged and torn. Without the least hesitation or show they tenderly picked him up in their arms and carried him to a bed of blankets beside the wagon. Then all three set about to dress his wounds and bathe him.

Walter and Ben remained unharmed with four bodies in at their feet.

To a crowd that collected Walter related the following:

"Three years ago this man, who calls himself Tom Whittlely, but whose name is Tom Sands, went to New York City on an excursion. While there he formed the acquaintance of my sister. He had lots of money, talked well and was a constant visitor at our house. Things went along nicely for a year, until one day he turned up among the interior. We suspected nothing until we noticed that my sister began to grow despondent. Then we made a startling discovery, he managed to keep it from public notice. One night my sister left the upper table and we did not see her again until we viewed her remains after they were found in the East River. That man was the cause of her trouble and shame, and, although I was away from New York while he was there, I can consequently never say him until a few weeks ago. I had seven or eight big, husky boys, do you know I name for what I have done?

Three cheers was the reply, and Walter and Ben rejoined the "tramp."

A few days later Albert Ballard, Walter's brother, arrived, bringing with him a large sum of money.

Walter, Albert and Ben entered into a business partnership, and they made money. The house they founded prospers to-day, and Walter and Ben speak in the business while the old grand-father uncle go off on their extended vacations.

Making Explosives.

No hospitals are ever required at Dynamite Factory, as no wounds are seldom found, says the Chicago Tribune. In a large mass of lishment, where immense quantities of powder are constantly being handled, there is never a case of accident. It is a very serious one, and all who are killed, death is instantaneous. Powder men realize the fact, and always assert with grim resignation that if anything happens they never expect to know anything about it. The chief dangers are those instantly in their full expectation.

The chief dangers connected with the manufacture of all high explosives is the unaccountableness of many explosions. Upon nitro-glycerine, dynamite and other unknown and uncontrollable causes explosions often occur in a mysterious and unaccountable manner.

Gelatine is the most powerful explosive now used. It is a compound of gun-cotton and nitro-glycerine, which must be mixed together till it resembles a thick, dark paste, like stiff tree jelly. The workmen mix it in a pan, a woman mixes flour and water into lough. The hands are covered with long rubber gloves. This gelatine powder is paste is more powerful as dynamite, and there is quite a demand for it in blasting the hardest rock in Massachusetts.

A most stupendous exhibition of nerve and coolness is sometimes required in the life of a man who works in dynamite. One year ago in a local factory a compound made of nitro-glycerine suddenly caught fire. Flames and fire high hired from the surface of the fluid. Superintendent Frank Roller and Foreman Erick Nelson were present, and they immediately turned compressed air into the tank, and by other means stopped the flame. It must be remembered that nitro-glycerine will burn till a heat of about 450 degrees is reached, and then it will explode. If the fire can be extinguished before that degree of heat is reached there will be no serious consequence. Roller and Nelson knew that the safer course to try to put out the flames, as if an explosion was to occur it would come too quickly for failure sense to a safe distance. A man under such circumstances, however, is more liable to use his legs than his thinking faculties. If that tank had exploded its mate standing within six feet of it would also have exploded, sending up 8,000 pounds of nitro-glycerine in one flash. The detonation would, no doubt, have been sensibly felt in all parts of the State.

Military Discipline.

Probably in no other army do we find such curious phases of military discipline as in our own. We note a recent court-martial case where a soldier, when at drill, having been corrected by his commanding officer for a mistake, did speak out in ranks and say, "I was right," and after the company had been brought to "place rest," approached the commanding officer and said: "Lieutenant, I was right and you were wrong," and the officer had been ordered to stop his talk and return to his place in ranks, said "I won't shut up, and I won't allow myself to be bulldozed by you or any one else." The unfortunate exercise of the "freedom of debate results in the withdrawal of the party of the second part from the active lists for the period of one year and a forfeiture of the sum of $120.—Army and Navy Journal.

The Mother-in-Law in New Britain.

Among the natives of the New Britain Islands a man may not speak to his mother-in-law. Not only is speaking forbidden to the relative, but she must be avoided. If by chance the lady is met the son-in-law must hide himself or cover his face. The reason of both parties is the outcome of the rule is broken. In 1871 one of the English missionaries tried to get at the natives' idea of an oath, and he found that the most solemn asseveration they could make was: If I am not telling the truth I hope I may meet my son-in-law and mother-in-law. — San Francisco Chronicle.

The human hair varies in thickness from 1,000 to 1,400 of an inch. Blonde hair is the finest, and red hair the coarsest. A German investigator finds that in four heads of hair of equal weight, the red one contains about 90,000 hairs, the black, 102,000, the brown 103,000, and the blonde 124,000.

JAKE'S JOLLIFICATION.

JAKE was tall for his years, round-shouldered, lank, stoop-shouldered, and with a stereotyped expression of wide-mouthed astonishment on his face. He was as fair a specimen of a backwoods Texan as one would wish to see. He was not long in Sabinetown, having reached that place in the latest field of his existence when he was inclined to occasionally diverge from parental authority and indulge in certain pleasures, such as half-holiday trips to the county seat town, attending picnics or dances on the green, an occasional horse-race, etc., for at home his father ordered the most strenuous objections to such proceedings.

But, taken all in all, Jacob Poe was not wildly bad; in fact, he was in many respects a most excellent boy. He had known no higher aim of life than the sphere in which he had been born and lived, and he was not ambitious to be anything else than a good boy, and he was a good boy. He was a fair specimen of a boy raised in the county—not the most intellectual, perhaps, but generally without evil

FARM AND GARDEN.

HOW AND WHEN TO PROPAGATE PLANTS BY LAYERS.

The Importance of Long Rows in Field Cultivation—Plant Lice, Attacks and Directions for Their Extermination by the Entomologist, Professor Cook.

Perhaps no family of insects is more widely distributed or more generally destructive and better known than plant lice. These pests do not content themselves with any single part of a plant. Some work on the roots and sap the vitality of the herb or tree; others draw their nourishment from the stems and twigs and thus blight the plants; still others suck the vitality from bud and foliage. A few work on both roots and leaves. Most cultivated vegetables, grains and trees have their characteristic plant louse enemies.

The first cut represents winged and wingless lice of natural size, also magnified.

Plant lice on outside vegetation pass the winter as little, dark, oblong eggs, usually fastened to the buds. With the warm days of spring these eggs hatch, and so rapidly do the lice increase that soon they are counted by millions. Another characteristic feature of plant lice is their sudden disappearance. This welcome riddance is due, Professor A. J. Cook, entomologist of the Michigan Agricultural college, states, to insect enemies of the plant lice.

WINGED AND WINGLESS LICE.

The lady bird, represented in the second cut, also the little maggot near it, revel amidst the plant lice. This maggot especially seems never satiated, but is constantly banqueting on the lice. The lady bird beetle, especially the larva or grubs (see same cut), also do signal service in the same direction. Many people through ignorance destroy these useful insects. There are several species of the ladybird family of the genus aphidius, very minute parasites, which also destroy these lice in great numbers.

A remedy suggested by Professor Cook, in a recent bulletin issued, is kerosene and soap mixture. To make this he uses one-fourth pound of hard soap, preferably whale oil soap, and one quart of water. This is heated until the soap is dissolved, when one pint of kerosene oil is added and the whole agitated till a permanent emulsion or mixture is formed. The agitation is easily secured by use of a force pump, pumping the liquid with force back into the vessel holding it. He then adds water so that there shall be kerosene in the proportion of one to fifteen.

ENEMIES OF THE PLANT LICE.

On the downwall, where the leaves roll and protect the lice, it is found that an application of this mixture, in the proportion of one to eight, and just before the plant lice eggs hatch, is astonishingly efficient. This early treatment is absolutely necessary in such cases as the rose ball, and is to be recommended on the score of economy in case of nursery stock and fruit trees. At an early stage it is not difficult to make thorough application than after the tree or plant is in full foliage.

This liquid must be applied with energy; a gentle sprinkling is not authentic. It ought to be put on with a good force pump that will scatter the liquid everywhere.

Propagating by Layers.

A layer, says Mr. A. S. Fuller in American Agriculturist, is only a rooting branch allowed to remain attached to the parent plant until it has formed roots through which it may collect sustenance for self support.

LAYERED BRANCH OF A TREE.

Various methods are employed to produce this result, such as ringing, girdling, twisting, tongueing or partly divulging that portion of the stem or branch on which it is desired the roots should be formed. All these distortions of the stems or branches of the plant layered are for one objective of that is, to check the downward flow of sap. Roots then become necessary for supplying sustenance to the cutting, or layer, and are consequently formed. The most vexatious difficulty of propagating layers is that of making a tongue on the under side of the branch. The operation is performed thus: Make an incision in the branch on part of the plant to be layered, both below a bud, cutting through the bark and into the wood to the depth of one-quarter to one-half its diameter; then pass the knife upward for an inch or more, according to the size and nature of the plant being layered, splitting the branch lengthwise, forming the tongue as shown in figure 1, at a. The branch is then bent down, and fastened in its place by means of a hooked peg, c, and the end kept up to a stake, as shown in figure 1. That part on which the incision is made is covered with soil or other material that will conduce to free light and air while at the same time keeping it moist, thus adding the development of roots. In making layers of certain kinds of small herbaceous plants and shrubs vines it will not be necessary to use pegs or stakes to hold the layer in place; but with larger plants they are usually needed for keeping the layered branch steady and in one position while the new roots are being emitted.

The proper time for making layers is as variable as that for making cuttings. But, as a rule, layers should be made while the parent plant is growing most rapidly, because roots will be produced at such times more readily than at any other, although with several kinds it will make very little difference, as they produce roots freely under almost all conditions and from all parts of the plant. With the larger proportion of both deciduous and evergreen trees and shrubs, layering should not begin until the leaves have fully expanded and the new growth of the season is fairly under way. If layered earlier, many of the deciduous trees and shrubs will "bleed," as it is termed, from the wounds made on the layered parts, and the sap flowing from these wounds will often corrode and otherwise injure the exposed cells and entirely prevent the production of roots therefrom. Wounds made in the branches of coniferous trees during the winter and early spring months are usually soon covered by the exuding resin, the severed and otherwise exposed cells thereby becoming fully protected, not only against the influence of moisture from without, but it effectually prevents the formation of a callus and production of roots. For this reason, such conifers as pines, spruce, and fir should always be layered at a time when the sap is thinnest and flowing most rapidly, as during the first growth of spring and early summer. With some kinds of hardy deciduous trees and shrubs the autumn is the better season in which to make layers.

Of Interest to Peach Growers.

In a recent circular from Commissioner Henderson, of Georgia, it is made apparent that in the partial failures of the peach crop the particular orchards or trees that escape the effects of frost are generally the same in each recurrence of such failure, and it is further stated that peach trees having this immunity from frosts are found here and there throughout the state. In order to call more general attention to this question and to learn from the observations of persons in all parts of the state the cause of these partial exemptions, inquiries were made of the correspondents of the department. These answers are of interest wherever the peach is cultivated, and are here given in substance:

In the answers received nearly all agree in stating that the fruit least injured is on the high grounds. The direction of the slope of the hill, while it may affect the time of blooming, is a factor of little importance compared with that of its altitude above the surrounding country. The topographical positions that prove best for the certainty of the crop are as follows:

1. Mountain sides, from the base to the altitude of 800 feet, regardless of the direction of slope. 2. Narrow valleys and coves sheltered by high mountains. 3. Narrow areas skirting the base of high mountains on all sides. 4. Ridges or hills and escarpments of table lands 100 to 800 feet above adjacent valleys. 5. Borders of large streams and lakes. Even in south Georgia, where the country is generally level, the exemption of the higher portions or slope adjacent to river valleys is quite common, and has its application not only to the peach crop, but to all fruits and vegetables subject to injury from late spring frosts.

Large Fields and Long Rows.

Mr. Bonham, secretary of the Ohio state board of agriculture, is a practical farmer and stock breeder, pork making being one of his specialties. To make pork profitably Mr. Bonham grows large quantities of corn to be fed with other food. He has one field containing twenty-five acres each and are 110 rods long and about one-third that width. The corn is planted in check rows so it can be cultivated both ways. To illustrate the difference in cost of cultivating large and small fields Mr. H. B. Terry, who recently visited Mr. Bonham, tells in The Country Gentleman that one of these twenty-five acre fields can be cultivated the long way in three days, while the cross cultivation the short way takes four and a half days. The New England Farmer, commenting on the above, says: "In 1885 the cost of the corn in the orth, exclusive of land rent, was $3.30 per acre, or nine cents per bushel. Including the rent of land the cost would be about $13 per acre, and this is the same whether the crop be large or small. If 100 bushels are produced per acre the cost per bushel would consequently be only thirteen cents, while a crop of fifty bushels would cost twenty-six cents per bushel. The average yield should be the country only twenty-eight bushels the cost must be about fifty cents per bushel. Large fields and long rows will do much to reduce the cost of this crop."

Dehorning Cattle.

As to dehorning cattle many opinions are given. Some few breeders think the practice will injure the prepotency of dairy bulls. Others think dairy cows are so mild and gentle that they will do no injury with their horns. Others cannot bear humanity to think that a hornless Jersey will look like a Jersey. The majority of breeders seem to agree that the horn is nothing but a weapon, of no use to an animal placed out of the reach of fighting, as all dairy cows should be. They would be ready to dehorn their steers if it is found to be arranged that all breeders would do it. The best time to destroy the horn, says Rural New Yorker, is while the animal is a calf. The operation is then no more painful than that of castration. Five years ago breeders would not think of such a thing as saving the horns off their cows; now they are quite ready to admit that the horns are useless and would be readily and easily disposed of. The question is, where will the horns be in five years more at this rate of progression?

To Break a Horse from Turning Around.

Some horses have a habit, when frightened by strange objects which they meet upon the road, of turning around as abruptly as to endanger the occupants of the carriage if a four wheeled vehicle. Colts, when first harnessed, if driven to a certain point and turned around, often commence repeating the trick every time they reach that particular spot. They generally turn in the same direction every time. The simplest remedy that we have heard for breaking up this habit is to take a light, strong bamboo fishpole, fasten the small end to the ring of the bit upon the side toward which the animal is accustomed to turn. Bring the other end of the pole back into the carriage. When the youngster attempts the usual trick push upon the pole with sufficient force to prevent his carrying out his purpose. This may not work in all cases where the animal is fully grown, and has been accustomed to the habit for a long time, but it will break up the habit in the majority of cases when taken in season.—American Cultivator.

Leeches in a Horse-Car.

A Fourth avenue car was rolling smoothly along up Madison avenue near Fifty-ninth street, the other day, when its ordinary assortment of all sorts of passengers were startled out of semi-listlessness by a shriek that would have made Buffalo Bill's proud scout Sioux burn with envy.

"Take it off! take it away! take it off!" screamed a nicely dressed lady, jumping into the aisle, with one hand on the bell-rope and the other outstretched to one of the startled male passengers. Her features were the picture of terror, and her black eyes gleamed with frantic intensity at the writer of her outstretched arm.

At first a suspicion swept through the minds of the knowing passengers that it was a case of snakes, but on looking at the pretty wrist, set off by a jeweled bracelet, they saw a real live leech.

A lawyer who has an office in the Potter building, and who has some nerve as well as gallantry, plucked off the leech and put it in a paper box which the lady had carried in her pocket. Meanwhile the other female passengers did what they could to sooth the frightened sister.

"How many leeches did you have, madame, in the box?" asked the lawyer.

"Three!" she gasped.

"Why, madame, there's only one here."

The shriek that followed was a chorus. Every female passenger thought she was wearing, one or both of the other sex, but the lawyer found both in the matting of the car, and one of them was crippled in the excitement.

The lady jumped off the car spitefully, to conceal her embarrassment. It turned out that she was the pretty wife of a well-known iron merchant and member of the 7th regiment, who was at home with a swelled leg. The wife had been down town to get the leeches to feed on her husband's leg but the druggist had cut too big a breathing hole for them. When the husband learned of his wife's adventure he laughed until his swelling went down.—New York Sun.

Col. Syd Douglas, in an address to the graduating class of the University of Maryland, said: "A young physician's first prescription should be for himself—a wife—to be taken immediately. A young preacher ought to go along without a wife. A young lawyer may get along without one, but a young collidate doctor won't do. His marriage will certainly carry more weight than his medical diploma. Doctors must be married and married, and there is nothing so likely to make them so as an early marriage."

THE NATIONAL GAME.

Enormous Attendance at the Three Last Base-Ball Games in Chicago—The Race for the Pennant.

THIRTY-SIX THOUSAND people attended the three base-ball games in Chicago on the 4th and 5th of July—two games being played on Independence day—between the representative clubs of New York and Chicago. The latter, by winning all three of them, jumped from fourth to second place in the race for the League pennant. Detroit still occupies first position, and the champions will have hard work to overcome the lead of the Wolverines. Following is the standing of the clubs on the 5th inst.:

	Played.	Won.	Lost.	Percentage.
Detroit	34	26	15	.634
Chicago	34	26	15	.634
Boston	34	23	12	.657

OHIO UNION LABOR CONVENTION.

George Ideas Rejected—A Full State Ticket Nominated.

THE Union Labor party of Ohio was convened at Columbus July 4. The Henry George wing of the party failed to secure any recognition in the platform, and a plank approving the action of the Chicago anarchists by almost a unanimous vote in the Committee on Resolutions. The following brief platform was adopted:

We indorse the platform of the Union Labor party promulgated at Cincinnati Feb. 22, 1887, and we further demand at the hands of the State that no fee system be abolished and that official salaries shall be commensurate with the service performed, the same as others; that laws be enacted to prevent bribery and intimidation of voters, or intimidation to secure nominations of anti-land monopoly candidates; that the laws of the State shall be so amended as to secure the enforcement of the laws against the illegal assessment of corporations; that all school books, printed by the State and furnished at cost, be uniform throughout the State; that the "trusts" be taken by the horns and dealers in futures and futures are declared to be illegitimate business; we heartily denounce and we denounce the courts of Ohio in failing to enforce the law during such acts criminal offenses that the discriminations by conductors against Knights of Labor and other labor organizations; we advocate the speedy trial of officers and shall be declared a felony; that railroad property be assessed for its salable value.

The following ticket was placed in nomination, without any opposition, and great enthusiasm on the part of the delegates, who rose and cheered each nomination as soon as made:

Governor, John Seitz, of Seneca County; Lieutenant Governor, J. Mahlman, of Hamilton; Clerk, Supreme Judges, Jesse Ivery, Judge's Clerk, Thomas Ryan; Judge of Circuit Court, Thomas Duncan; Auditor, O. A. Norton, of Scioto; Treasurer, G. M. Hunter, of Stark; Attorney General, William Baker, of Lucas; member Board of Public Works, Carl A. Inder, of Cuyahoga.

PANIC ON A STREET CAR.

A Woman Killed and Several Persons Hurt at Fitchburg, Mass.

A FITCHBURG (Mass.) dispatch says: As a car on the Fitchburg horse railroad was on the way to the last grounds loaded with noisy passengers, many of them hanging to the platforms and sides of the car, a horse ran away. Some one shouted, "Jump for your life!" Passengers rose from their seats in a panic, forcing those standing between the seats on to the crowded platforms. Several persons were pushed off, and Marian O'Brien, aged 19, was killed, her neck and skull being broken. A number of persons were badly hurt.

TURKEY NEGLECTS TO SIGN.

British Commissioner Wolff Instructed to Leave Constantinople.

A LONDON dispatch of the 6th inst. says: In the House of Lords yesterday afternoon Lord Salisbury announced that the Anglo-Turkish convention in reference to Egypt had not been ratified by Turkey, and that Sir Henry Drummond Wolff, the special British Commissioner, has been instructed to leave Constantinople.

THE EASTERN STATES.

EX-GOV. MORRILL died at his home in Augusta, Me., on the 4th of July. He was unconscious at the time of death, and had been for several days. Mr. Morrill was 84 years of age.

AFTER consulting for thirteen minutes, the jury in the trial of Jacob Sharp returned a verdict of guilty, at New York, with a recommendation to mercy. The penalty is ten years in the penitentiary, or $5,000 fine, or both. An effort will be made to secure a new trial. A New York special says of the closing scenes of the trial:

The jury in the Sharp case after a deliberation of only thirteen minutes found the defendant Jacob Sharp guilty of bribery. He will not be sentenced before July 15, for the court has been adjourned until that day. When the jury came into court Sharp's face showed that he spoke truth when charging his position, the Judge and the jury. He slanted both hands to cover the head of his color and bowed his head like a man who was expecting the worst. Clerk Fitzpatrick read the indictment, read, and called the names of the jurors. "How say you, gentlemen of the jury, is the defendant guilty or not guilty?" Foreman Cardozo lost his head for a moment. The responsibility of his position overcame him and he replied "Not guilty." There was a hum of astonishment. Judge Barrett looked disconcerted. Mr. Maclaghlin and Assistant District Attorney Nicoll turned pale and looked into each other's eyes. Sharp dropped back into his chair as if struck by lightning. All these things and many more happened in less time than it takes to record them. The foreman was requested to "reconsider, if mean guilty—guilty as indicted." The crowd subsided. Judge Barrett breathed again; the color returned to the faces of the District Attorney and his assistant. The jury filed in, looking more determined than ever, and Jacob Sharp jumped in his chair and stared at the jury with his small, deep-set eyes. Not a quaver, not a gasp, not the slightest emotion was visible in that heavy face that bore broad sloping shoulders, those great hands firmly clasped on the table, and the face of a strong designer confronting destiny on account of the mistake of the foreman sufficient to break up the strongest man, and he was an old man, nearly three score and ten, suffering from diabetes and Bright's disease. Foreman Cardozo spoke the fatal the record book from the desk. "Listen to the verdict as recorded, gentlemen. You find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment. So say you all, gentlemen?" The jurors assented. The clerk addressed himself to Sharp; asked the customary question, "Have you any reason to offer why judgment should not be passed?" Sharp rose and addressed the court. "I beg your Honor's pardon, the jury has spoken, and I will take the fault of guilty they recommend the defendant to mercy." Recorder Smith: "Do I understand the jury to say," he asked, "that they recommend that Mr. Sharp be pardoned?" "No," said the foreman, "we recommend mercy."

THE WESTERN STATES.

A VERY rigid Sunday-observance law was passed by the Missouri Legislature, and the citizens of St. Louis are prepared for its strict enforcement. It prohibits the opening of saloons, billiard-rooms, theatres, bowling-alleys, ball-grounds, public and lake grounds on Sunday. The saloons have combined to fight the law, and will make a test case to determine its constitutionality.

A CHICAGO special of Thursday says: "The defense in the ominous bonfire case were arraigned for trial yesterday. All pleaded not guilty except Lucifer Coleman, alias John, who put in a plea of guilty. Lynn, with Rippen, the butcher, and Perry, the ex-soldier of the infirmary, will testify for the State. The work of getting a jury has begun, and promises to prove an all summer's job. County Commissioner Dan Cohen, one of the accused, was arrested yesterday by his bondsman, Col. Ab Taylor, and unless he gives a new bond will have to go to jail. The gang is thoroughly demoralized."

A. A. TALMADGE, Vice-President and General Manager of the Wabash Railway, died in his private car at Peru, Ind., of Bright's disease of the kidneys. He was on his way to Toledo from St. Louis, accompanied by his wife and two physicians. From Toledo the party intended taking a yacht cruise of some ten days around Lake Erie. The body was embalmed and taken to St. Louis. Mr. Talmage was a cousin of the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, of Brooklyn, and was reputed to be rich, based at least $500,000 in good securities. He began railroading as a clerk in the general freight office of the Lake Shore road at Buffalo.

AN SAN FRANCISCO dispatch says that William Kissane, alias W. K. Rogers, has filed a demurrer in the Circuit Court to the suit of the Chemical National Bank of New York, the beginning of which action was made the occasion for reviving the remarkable criminal record of Kissane in the East. In the demurrer the counsel for Kissane hold that the present action is barred by the statute of limitations."

The heirs of E. L. Harper and Ben E. Hopkins, late officers of the wrecked Fidelity Bank, were Thursday at Cincinnati increased to $250,000 and $100,000 respectively.

A CHICAGO telegram of Friday says: "The war is over!" "Good by, boys!" "Empty is the pool-room, Riley's gone!" Those exclamations and others of a like tenor were chalked up on the big blackboards in Riley's pool-room or 'gamblers' alley last evening, in imitation of the fact that the sovereign State law against pool-room gambling goes into effect to-day and that the glory of Riley's bad departed. Fully 5,000 men and boys were in the pool-room at 6 o'clock, when one of these inscriptions was being chalked on the board. Some were waiting to get their tickets cashed on Tennessee, the winner of a hurdle race at Washington Park, and others who had no tickets to cash were lingering perversely around asking each other if life was any longer worth living. All of them raised a howl when Riley's clerk chalked up "Nobody home." One suicide and four known embezzlements are credited to losses in the Chicago pool-room during the past week.

A RATHER unfavorable report on crop conditions in Kansas has just been issued by the Territorial Statistician of Dakota. Hot winds have proved injurious. Corn average 100 per cent, with an increased acreage, while the condition of spring wheat is but 86 per cent. Farm parts of Illinois, Wisconsin and Indiana report are to the effect that vegetation is suffering for rain. In some districts there has been sufficient showers last week that did much good. The yield of grass is quite large in portions of the States mentioned.

THE hay crop throughout the Northwest is turning out poorly. The apple prospects are described as far to middling. Wheat in Kansas has been seriously injured by chinch-bugs.

THE real-estate transactions in Chicago during the first six months of 1887 aggregate 7,905,969, an aggregate consideration of $41,016,177, as against 6,550 sales, aggregating $34,675,936, during the corresponding period of 1886.

THE SOUTHERN STATES.

AT Cuperton, W. Va., Lolly Robinson, a negro, shot and killed Charles Williams, colored, because he had married Mrs. Robinson, Robinson surrendered to officers, but was taken by a mob and lynched.

OWING to the reduction of receipts, due to the prohibitory law, the internal revenue office for Kentucky has been transferred to the Louisiana office. The receipts have fallen off $250,000, and are decreasing annually.

JIM MCELROY, a negro, was hanged at Henderson, Ky., Friday, for the murder of William Mark. As long as he had breath the condemned declared himself innocent. Albert Turner, a colored man, for the murder of Jennie Bowman, died on the scaffold at Louisville, Ky., Friday. He said if he was not given a decent burial he would haunt all the negroes in the place.

As a result of the Oak Ridge (La.) assault and riot, thirteen persons are dead, one white man and twelve negroes. A number of the colored men were lynched. Others said to be concerned in the affray are being pursued and will be hung if captured. A New Orleans special gives the following account of the sanguinary affair:

The first information of the affair, and indeed all that could be obtained up to the present time, was that on the morning of June 27 a posse convening by jail a prisoner, a colored man, charged with the murder of a white man, left Oak Ridge with a guard of twenty men and two of the posse were wounded. After the shooting the negroes went to a cabin about two miles from town. Learning of their whereabouts officers went to arrest them, and in getting close enough were drawn into a fusillade from the negroes. Deputy Sheriff Denham was instantly killed, and Constable John Cooper Gardner, and Baker were dangerously wounded. During the fight Jerry Robinson, his son, and four other negroes that were in the cabin were killed. The negroes succeeded in escape from the cabin were killed, apparently scattered and hung. Monday twelve negroes were captured and put in jail. The white people held a public meeting, and appointed a guard of twenty men to guard the prisoners. The other negroes being all established his innocence, was discharged. Another negro was captured the same day and hung on the banks of the Ban Bleu, near Oak Ridge. The total number killed was thirteen, twelve negroes and one white man. Several other negroes were wounded, but not mortally, but all have succeeded in the affair were in pursuit, with the intention of hanging them if they find them.

THE NATIONAL CAPITAL.

A CRANK, who has been threatening to kill the President, is in custody at Washington. His name is Krebs and he hails from Illinois. He says President Cleveland owes him $100,000,000, and that he won't pay the debt, and that he means to make him do it. He also carry fire he held a piece of soap in his hand and said: "If I can't get anything else, I'll kill Cleveland with this."

THE POLITICAL FIELD.

JOHN T. MOONE, of Jackson, Ohio, was unanimously nominated for Congress by the Republican Convention, at Delaware, and 500 delegates were in attendance. The platform says of the Dow liquor law that ample trial has shown that it was designed as a scowling concession to temperance, while really putting the cause at a disadvantage. The labor plank was opposed by Schumacher and others, and the convention finally adopted a plain declaration of anarchy. Woman suffrage was not indorsed. A full State ticket was placed in the field, headed by Morris Sharp for Governor.

THE Chairmen of the Republican and Democratic Central Committees of Utah have united in a public address denouncing the movement for the admission of the Territory as the basis of a Mormon scheme of sinister significance.

THE INDUSTRIAL REALM.

GENERAL MASTER WORKMAN POWDERLY at Philadelphia, on Thursday, detailed facts concerning child labor pleased from the long rec dence in the coal region. He showed how the children whose schooms was scarcely over, as they grew into manhood, would naturally gravitate into the Knights of Labor libertarian, ignorant, and devoid of intelligence.

"These are the men," continued Mr. Powderly, "that the Knights of Labor have to deal with, and if possible mold into something better. Ignorance is the cause of all our troubles. Strikes are made out of hand, and the blame lighter by any one who may be an enemy of the Knights, simply because they cannot add up a column of figures. The ignorance of many of the Knights is what causes much of the trouble in strike, but it does not end here. It is ignorance that fills the ranks of the Knights of Geographies and places there under influences that bring about a state of affairs worse than anarchy."

Mr. Powderly's face brightened with hope, but it darkened again as he said:

But there is one question that the American people must take up that penalty concerns that workingman. It is or will become the burning question of the day—an issue which will exceed in importance—and that question is the problem of the great, unceasing flood of immigration from old Europe. I am utterly opposed to all forms of paper immigration, and to a great deal of immigration pure and simple. The time has arrived when all immigration will cease, and when all immigrants will be allowed three nationalities to enter here and become a human in our country, and a member of the American home. As a friend to the race he should be excluded I would make it an almost indelible rule that it takes a generation to make a man, and that his children and children's children are born and bred in the American home.

THE INTESTATE COMMISSION.

In the United States Circuit Court at Portland, Oregon, on Tuesday, Judge Deady announced the following decision on the petition of the receiver of the Oregon and California Railroad for instructions:

The fact that there is competition in the carriage of persons or property or or from a particular place, is a circumstance to be taken in connection with other matters of the interstate commerce act, in determining whether a given place is within the act. Monday twelve negroes were captured and put in jail. The white people held a public meeting, and appointed a guard of twenty men to guard the prisoners. The other negroes being all established his innocence, was discharged. Another negro was captured the same day and hung on the banks of the Ban Bleu, near Oak Ridge. The total number killed was thirteen, twelve negroes and one white man. Several other negroes were wounded, but not mortally, but all have succeeded in the affair were in pursuit, with the intention of hanging them if they find them.

The court instructs the receiver that he is authorized to make a lower rate for a long haul than a short haul in connection with competition, when such rate is not in connection with other lines or means of transportation, the same is necessary to enable the road to retain or acquire business.

THE FOREIGN BUDGET.

THE British Medical Journal says Dr. Mooney's tumor has removed, almost all of the fungus growth that remained in the throat of the standard silver dollars, and the gold holdings of the Treasury increased $397,996. The increase of silver circulation for the fiscal year to date is $17,000,000, and the increase in the gold holdings during the same time has been $9,000,000. The fiscal year just ended the principal of the bonded debt of the United States decreased $127,011,050, and the amount of the accrued but unpaid interest on such debt decreased $508,931. The decrease of the principal of the debt during the year ended June 30 was an increase of $69,182,884 in gold and silver certificates, and an increase of $40,983,884 in the cash in the Treasury, showing a net decrease in the public debt of the aggregate of $168,576,646. WHERE CUSTER FELL.

The Scene of the Terribly Disastrous Fight of the Little Big Horn.

Story of the Fight as Told by Chief Gall and His Indians—Sitting Bull Not There.

I have just returned from the field where Custer fell, writes J. M. T., in the New York World. There can hardly be a wilder, lonelier, or more dreary-looking spot in all the United States. A worn and weather-beaten monument crowns the highest point of the battle-field. The shaft is rapidly disintegrating under the combined influences of burning sun, driving rains, wintry storms and withering winds. This part of the valley of the Little Horn River, which was the scene of the disaster of June 25, 1876, is about fourteen miles above Fort Custer, on the right and left banks of the clear Lesser Horn, as it winds down through the valley from the big Horn range. It was a lage-hazard selection for a battle-ground, and slightly more favorable to the soldiers than to the red men, otherwise, instead of Custer, and his handful of men escaping after a terribly close contest, in which defeat meant annihilation and nothing else, not one man would have been left alive to tell the terrible story of that dread-ful June day. I have had exceptional opportunities for striving at the truth concerning the massacre, and I am convinced that neither the reds nor the whites knew what they were about when the battle was begun. General Custer knew that a large and powerful Indian village was over in the little Horn Valley somewhere, and he determined, with rare pluck though extreme rashness, to attack the village in his usual pell-mell style, depending upon dash and discipline to carry the day. Custer is again his superiors, and will require it for several weeks. In the meantime surgical operations will be performed, and the amputation of Mackenzie is not troubled at the Prince's condition.

ST. PETERSBURG dispatch: The Official Messenger announces that twenty-one persons were tried last year for crimes against the State with being members of the secret society, the "Will of the People," of complicity in several murders, attempts on the life of Sudeikin, of participation in robberies and dynamite outrages and with starting secret printing presses. Fourteen of the accused, including two women, were sentenced to death, but the sentence of two of the men were commuted to exile in Siberia and those of the others to imprisonment at hard labor. Two others were sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor, and one to imprisonment without labor. Three of the accused were acquitted.

THE CONTINENT AT LARGE.

R. G. DUN & Co., in their weekly review of trade, say:

Trade has been one of satisfactory business for the week, but of unusual distribution. Speculation has reached the stock market, but to a much less extent than a month ago, being confined largely to railroad shares. The speculation, especially rapid, but hesitation in prices is evidently prevailing very favorably in all parts of earnings, indicates that the process of liquidation is nearly completed, and that speculation, if moderate, will be confined to a much more exception satisfactory, made being good for the time of the year, collections fair or better, and money in reasonable supply at all interior points. The failure of Ward Brothers and Cahill seem to have had little effect elsewhere.

The national anniversary was generally observed throughout the country. The survivors of the famed Philadelphia and Perter's Brigades clasped hands at Gettysburg. Belvel yell and Yankee cheer mingled, and the wife and daughter of General Pickett were assisted to the stand by General Burns and dedicated a bronze. The Tammany Society of New York held its ninety-first celebration of the day, Governor Fitzhugh Lee, of Virginia, was a guest, and was the orator of the occasion. At Salt Lake City there was an enthusiastic demonstration, in which both Mormons and gentiles are said to have participated harmoniously. Numerous deaths and injuries from premature explosions, accidents of gunpowder, fireworks, are ignoring the long and short hand section of the Inter-State Commerce law.

A Couple of Columns Devoted to the Fair Daughters of Eve.

Embracing a Few Seasonable Hints About the Latest Styles in Dress.

A Promised Revival.

It is said that there are strong indications that the coquet will succeed tennis this year as a fashionable game. Fashionable people, who consider it particularly desirable to look well at tennis, and if the idea is carried out all the fair tennisonian appears on the field in all the bravery of a fresh coat of paint, with rich turquoise, sang shoe, and coxcomb and sleeve more so, she is merely adhering to a custom that, if tennis is no game; for a tennis costume proper is no doubt a thing apart from dresses of any other description, and is certainly, in the opinion of many, which is made for genuine service, and not a player who is on the field for a serious game, and not simply to look pretty and to make some impression on the gallery, can not one one in half-a-dozen times come and tumble over a tennis net, and then be suddenly came to the rack when dopt the utility suit of plain skirt and jacket, or, if it is not out, with a blue serge skirt, and not becoming, which settles its fate immediately. Rather than be called the culprit of defeat upon defeat from lack of freedom of action occasioned by the wearing of hindering garments, than to come off a trium phant victor while looking like a guy. The average girl tennis players do not really take enough genuine interest in the game to make a decided sacrifice of personal appearance for its lively sake, and for various reasons there must be a game of some sort, croquet is once again thought of, and revived, for at the same there is far less likelihood of failure, there is less violent exercise, there can be an amount of charming gowning done, without any detriment to the game, or any ignatient shoulder-shrugs, or covert grunts of disapproval from the footer of the ball who attempts weak tennis. There is also far more fun for a mixed party, and more social side chats, and altogether it is no doubt a better summer game for the majority.

Caps and Belles.

Unfortunately one of the most charming things in the world is to have a good thing spoiled by some one doing something to it. Caps are a case in point. Nothing is more becoming and reasonably pretty over, too, but most often they are spoiled by being made exaggerated gray hair by some dutiful daughter.

There is no more beautiful than such a gift. A dainty, fresh, delicate cap, with a flowing veil, is a fitting and fashionable fact to loving eyes.

The Jolly Girl.

The jolly girl is born, not made, no training or endeavor can counterfeit her charm. Nature, in her kind, perfect effort, but it is only skin-deep, says a writer in the Chicago Times. The jolly girl lives under adverse circumstances—in bad weather, when she has a headache, or when she has the toothache, when she has her sweetheart, or she thinks he is sweetheart, when her back hair tumbles down in spite of her, when her mean-tempered male neighbor at the theater insists on her standing up when she wants to see over some one's bonnet, when she is in that feminine misery, the blues, when she is sure she is sure that she is noisy; there is jolliny of the half-like, enthusiastic, and all the time it is the jolly girl.

The girl who makes up her mind that she will be jolly, and that she will be jolly or die, usually overdoes the business. Her jolliness is forced, her laughter and in chattering nonsense, that is a sickly imitation of the jolly girl, and has a quality of the mind which disposes one to think that it is trying to wed with a rainbow on the cloud and the silver lining behind. It is a jolliness that is forced, and is a cause of mirth. Some believe that jolliny is an attribute of the minds of other people, and that if you can be jolly, you will be jolly or die, usually overdoes the business. The jolly girl is a good-humored and the person whose disposition is sweet at a moment's notice, quite the reverse? The jolly girl is not suppose to be the person who has no sense or peevishness; laughing airs do not go well with jolliny, but jolly at a glance that they are borrowed phrases. The jolly girl is not a girl who is a nervous, and has a nervous system, that is, she is not a girl who is a nervous, and has a nervous system, that is, she is not a girl who is a nervous, and has a nervous system, that is, she

Only four Michigan cities applied for the free mail delivery system under the new postal laws passed by the last congress, and after examination they were supplied. These cities are Adrian, Saginaw, Ann Arbor, and Muskegon. Three other Michigan cities that do not now enjoy the service are fairly entitled to it, viz.: Flint, Manistee, and Port Huron.

Advices from Washington are that Frank Conger's time is about up as postmaster of Washington City, and the belief is that his successor will be named in a few days. Michigan has had this fat appointment for many years, and there was talk at one time of booming a Michigan democrat as Conger's successor, but Washington democrats assert that the appointment this time will be given to a local man.

Bumble-Bees Have Memory.

A valuable contribution to natural science has been made by Prof. Edward Hoffer in the discovery of a remarkable power of memory in the bumble-bee. The little creature has evidently a strong sense of locality comparative to that of a carrier-pigeon. The professor removed a nest containing numerous bumble-bees (Bombus terrisris) from its original location and carried it to his residence, about three miles distant. He further carefully watched the place for some time, after having captured all the bees who had flown to the defense of their nest and; it is believed, the entire colony. These he imprisoned for several hours in a wide-mouthed bottle, and safely united them to their new home. At his house he placed the nest, with its inhabitants, near a window, and, after the latter had been quieted, made a small entrance. Immediately the bees began to fly out and in doing so must have observed their surroundings, for in a short time they one by one returned. The following night, however, there was a severe storm, and while the inhabitants of other colonies of bees wear it had become so accustomed to their surroundings were not in the least trouble, these bees, escaped and hid themselves somewhere without during the storm. Upon searching for them early the next morning, the queen was found dead upon the ground, while fifty or sixty workers were seen flying about the house. From time to time one or another—possibly those which had flown out of the entrance the day before—found the opening and returned into their nest, while the remainder, after flying about for several hours, gradually disappeared till not one was left. As it was supposed that they had in all probability returned to their previous nest the place was visited in the afternoon, where at least fifty of them were found. They had thus, it will be seen, distinctly remembered it, and after they had sought in vain to find entrance to their new home they had demonstrated on their wonderful sense of locality and returned thither.

An Actress and a Ring.

"The dearest days to me are those I spent in Germany," said Miss Janauschek "when I played before poor King Ludwig, of Bavaria, in his magnificent theater in Munich. Oh, those were glorious days, days of triumphs and tributes. If I had my jewelcase with me now I could show you some of the presents the young king gave me. A miniature of himself set in precious stones, and a bracelet of pure Grecian design made all of diamonds, which he asked me to wear in my classical parts. When I first played in Munich the boy prince was then kept away from the theater, and the opera, and everything which he afterward loved so much. It was a great mistake, for as soon as he came to the throne and was his own master the passions which had been suppressed broke out in all manner of extravagant forms. I was sent for by him shortly after his accession to play ten of my favorite parts. I had only to appear three or four times a week, as I the life we led was spent among the most brilliant minds and artists of the country.

"When I had completed half my engagement Ludwig ordered me to appear in all the classical plays of Schiller, Lessing, Goethe, and Racine. Do you know what that meant? The plays were many of them six hours in duration. The curtain rose on 'Don Cesar' at 5 o'clock and fell at 1. At 11 o'clock the audience went out for refreshment, and dinner was served the artists in their dressing-rooms. During the engagement I played 'Phedre,' 'Iphigenia,' 'Medea,' and 'Antigone.' In 'Antigone' we had Mendelssohn's music throughout, with the Greek chorus and the solos correctly given after the original Greek rules. I did not appear in the last act and went to my hotel, where I was shortly after sent for to appear before the curtain. The audience would not leave the theater until I bowed once more to them. In everything he did Ludwig acted like a king. In one play a Swedish was used, and each night the king sent a real one from his own garden, which he asked might be used in the piece. While I was in Munich he had twenty-eight photographs taken of me in my different parts and placed in his album. Later he gave way to those mad freaks of which we heard so much. He was only 19 when I knew him, but he was a noble boy, a patron of art, and worshiped by his people.—Philadelphia Press.

English as She is Taught.

Mark Twain contributes to the Century under the above title some examples of the curious answers made by pupils in our public schools. We quote a few as follows:

Aborigines, a system of mountains.

Alias, a good man in the Bible.

Amenable, anything that is mean.

Amiably, state of being an acid.

Auriferous, pertaining to an orifice.

Ammonia, the fool of gods.

Capillary, a little caterpillar.

Corniferous, rocks in which fossil corn is found.

Emolument, a headstone to a grave.

Equestrian, one who asks questions.

Exobaric, one who plays euchre.

Frowzies, anything belonging to the French.

Idolater, a very idol person.

Specie, a man who likes a good dinner.

Irrigate, to make fun of.

Maelstrom, what can be mended.

Mercenary, one who feels for another.

Parasite, a kind of umbrella.

Parricide, the murder of an infant.

Publican, a man who does his prayers in public.

Transitive, ten acres of land."

Here is one where the phrase "publicans and sinners" has got mixed up in the child's mind with politics, and the result is a definition which takes one in a sudden and unexpected way:

Republican, a sinner mentioned in the Bible."

Also in the Democratic newspapers now and then.

Here are two where the mistake has resulted from sound assisted by remote fact:

Plagiarist, a writer of plays.

Demagogue, a vessel containing beer and other liquids."

Here is one which—well, now, how often we do slam right into the truth without ever suspecting it:

"The men employed by the Gas Company go round and speculate the meter."

And here—with "zoological" and "geological" in his mind, but not ready to his tongue—the small scholar has innocently gone and let out a couple of secrets which ought never to have been divulged in any circumstances.

"There are a good many donkeys in theological gardens.

"Some of the best fossils are found in theological cabinets."

Chinese Sampans.

Looking over the side we see the first evidence of our approach to the Flowery kingdom, for we are surrounded by sampans manned by Chinese oarsmen. These boats are short and flat-bottomed, with the bow looking like the snout of an alligator and the stern rounding up into two curved spars in the same fashion as the handles of a baby-carriage. The boatmen stand up and propel them by pushing the oars, the handles of which they cross in front of them. These boats are generally painted in bright colors, and always have a large eye painted on each bow. If you ask a boatman why those eyes are there, he will answer you: "No hab eye, how can see? No can see, how can sabee? No can sabee, how can do?" The boatmen don't wear much clothing, but they make up for such lack by wearing a cone-shaped hat from two to three feet in diameter.—Cor. Baltimore Sun.

The great men are with us yet. Christopher Columbus is teaching school at Tabor, Iowa, and William Shakspeare is crossing Blackstone somewhere in Michigan.

The stingray is the natural enemy of San Francisco oysters. The fish has a powerful pair of jaws, with which he considers it no trick whatever to smash the shell of an oyster into powder, after which he sucks the meat into his stomach and discards the rocky debris.

In order to obtain a larger vertical angle of illumination from the arc electric lights used for lighthouses, Professor Sir James Douglass has introduced a fluted carbon. This prevents the formation of a crater, and therefore gives a steadier and more uniformly distributed light.

Recent explorations in New Zealand show that vegetation is making its appearance on the debris spread over the face of the country during the volcanic eruptions. A portion of the Pinx terrace has been found, and it is believed that the White terrace is still intact, but covered with mud.

There is a little negro boy about 7 years of age living near Uniontown, Ala., who seems to possess a wonderful talent. He can take a lump of mud from the roadside and with his hand form any animal he ever saw, and the representation is almost perfect. All the proportions are good.

Miss Maud Banks, daughter of Gen. N. P., is now regularly on the stage. She is playing Parthenia in "Ingomar" in the small towns of Pennsylvania. The general, who is, now 71 years of age, still holds the office of United States Marshal in Boston, and runs an experimental farm of sixty acres just outside the city.

An English alliterative triumph is the following line, composed by a lady in the year 1800 on the occasion of a gentleman of the name of Lee planting a lane with elms:

"Let every elm one Lee's lovely lane!"

In which not only every word, but every syllable, commences with the same letter.

A physician referring to the custom of traveling on sleeping cars with the berths made up with their heads toward the engine, said: "It is certainly bad for the brain of the sleeper, as it is not natural, and it is no wonder that so many travelers, especially those who have been on the road exclusively, experience bad effects from it."

A Saginaw City, Mich., young man bought a pair of ladies' shoes on time and gave them to his best girl. They were "mighty too big," and the lady took them to the store for exchange, when the proprietor explained that they had not been paid for and he guessed he'd keep them. The lady will use to recover from the sweet cake.

A new departure in the ways of women is the formation of a fire brigade. According to the London Fireman, this has been done by a thousand girls employed in a Liverpool cigar factory. They are well officered and drilled, and at a recent blaze in the factory turned out "to a man" and did most effectual work in subduing the flames.

One of the most inveterate cigarette smokers in Galt, Canada, is a 6-year old, who uses any paper he can get hold of in which to roll his tobacco. The other evening he went into his mother's room in the dark, and picking up a piece of paper from the bureau rolled a cigarette, and had burned two-thirds of it before it was discovered he was smoking a $10 bill.

A man dropped into the office of the Oneida (N. Y.) Dispatch, the other day, and offered to subscribe for two years in advance, if the proprietor would take his pay in dogs. The editor replied: "For many years I have taken wood, apples, potatoes, applejack, and all sorts of vegetables in payment of subscriptions, but there must be a limit; I draw the line on dogs!"

Bishop William Taylor has named the steamer which he is to use on the Upper Congo for his wife, "Annie Taylor." During their married life of more than forty years Mr. and Mrs. Taylor have been much separated by his missionary work. "Yet to this day," he says, "I never heard her object to my going or staying, nor utter a murmur on account of my absence."

The use of the gall of rattlesnakes is warmly urged by M. Kosielcky, of Austria, as an antidote for snake bites. M. Kosickl, who became acquainted with the antidote at Venezuela, declares it to be both inexpensive and effective, as well as instantaneous, in its operation, cures and days in the last stage of the poison recovering immediately on the remedy being administered to them.

Farmer Redmond, near Sturgeon, Mo., owned a hog that was afflicted with inability to breath through its nose, so he trained it to carry a cob in its mouth to keep its jaws open so that it could breathe. For the past four years the hog has been going around with a cob. When it wanted to eat it laid down its cob, and when it got through picked it up again.

On Jekyl Island, Georgia, there is a band of horses so wild that they run at the sight of man. William Turner, who has charge of a club house on the island, says that the other morning one of these horses came to the barn, apparently in great pain, allowed herself to be haltered, and showed unmistakable signs of gratitude when Turner doctored her and gave her relief. Usually these horses are very stubborn and vicious, and nearly die of starvation before they will yield to man.

The only cure' sities brought to light by the Savage since the work was begun on the Cape Cod canal have been a strange collection of about fifty figures carved in oak, which are supposed to have remained under the sand and debris of the marsh for the past century or more. The story goes that the artist who executed them was a poor demented fellow by the name of Nye, whose fondness for a sandwich belie by the name of Hester Tupper, led him to seek employment for his leisure time by carving her effigy and various symbolic signs upon pieces of oak and hiding them in the ditches of water which furrowed the marsh.

Renews Her Youth.

Mrs. Frank Chase, Paterson, Clay Co. Iowa, tells the following remarkable story, the truth of which is known far by the residents of the town: "I am 73 years old, have been troubled with kidney complaints and bareness for many years and was almost worn out and worthless. Now I am free from all pain and soreness, and able to do all my own housework. I owe my thanks to Electric Bitters for having renewed my youth and restored completely all disease and pain." Give Them a Chance!

That is to say, your lungs. Also all your breathing machinery. Very wonderful machinery it is. Not only the larger air-passages, but the thousands of little tubes and cavities leading from them.

When these are clogged and choked with matter which ought not to be there, your lungs cannot half do their work. And what they do, they cannot do well.

Call it cold, cough, croup, pneumonia, catarrh, consumption, or any other name, the family of throat and head and lung obstructions, all are bad. All ought to be got rid of. There is just one sure way to get rid of them. That is to take Boschee's German syrup, which any druggist will sell you at 75 cents a bottle. Even if everything else has failed you, you may depend upon this for certain.

A Captain's Fortunate Discovery.

Capt. J. O. Adams, the well known steamboat man on Atlantic City and New York, had been troubled with a cough so that he was unable to sleep, and was advised to try Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption. It not only gave him instant relief, but affected the extreme soreness in his breast. His children were similarly affected and a single dose had the same happy effect. Dr. King's New Discovery is now the standard remedy in the Coleman household and on board the schooner. Free Trial bottles of this standard Remedy at Dr. G. W. Crouter's drug store. 4

Ayer's Hair Vigor keeps the hair soft and pliant, imparts to it the lustre and freshness of youth, cleanses it to perfectly eradicates Dandruff, cures all scalp diseases, and is the most cleanly of all hair preparations.

AYER'S Hair Vigor has given me nearly half for six years, during which time I used many hair preparations, but without success. Indeed, that little hair I had, was growing thinner, until I tried Ayer's Hair Vigor. My head is now bottles of the Vigor, and my hair is now well covered with a new growth of hair. —Judson B. Chapel, Peabody, Mass.

HAIR that has become weak, gray, and faded, may have new life and color restored to it by the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. ✱My hair was thin, faded, and dry, and fell out in large quantities. Ayer's Hair Vigor stopped the falling, and restored my hair to its original color. As a dressing for the hair, this preparation has no equal.—Mary S. Hammond, Stillwater, Minn.

VIGOR, youth, and beauty, in the bloom of the appearance of the hair, may be preserved for an indefinite period by the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. ✱A disease of the scalp caused my hair to become harsh and dry, and to fall out freely. Nothing I tried seemed to do me any good until I commenced using Ayer's Hair Vigor. Three bottles of this preparation restored my hair to a healthy condition, and it is now soft and pliant. My scalp is cured, and it is also free from dandruff.—Mrs. E. H. Foss, Milwaukee, Wis.

Local Notes and News.

The dredge has been working in the upper cut this week.

The tug Minnie Warren is again in the water, towing logs for Nicholls' sawmill.

Perry Weed's ice cream soda takes the cake this hot weather, for a cooling off drink.

Our people should remember that the boys band would look better in new uniforms.

The fifty foot crib for the extension of the south pier has been completed, and is being placed this week.

A good job of grading the Ironton road in front of the Charlevoix resort has been done during the past week.

Alick Rosenthal has a large sign on the south wall of Lewis block, advertising dry goods, carpets and clothing.

A time card of the G. R. & I. R. R. can be found in this weeks issue that gives the time all trains leave Petoskey.

Wm. Ferguson has leased his boarding house to G. T. Marshall, of East Jordan, who will take possession July 21.

Dr. Carlstein announces his office hours in the future to be from 8 to 10 in the morning, and 6 to 8 in the evening.

A. T. Washburne & Co. have hoisted a large and beautiful flag over their store, advertising dry goods and carpets.

W. Bipley & Co. have opened the "Bell Boat Livery" at the rear of the Bridge Street House, that they advertise this week by cards.

Jas. and Ernest Beauvais go as guides to a large party of fishermen and pleasure seekers to the Lake Superior trout streams on Monday next.

D. S. Way reports a gratifying business in photo. work this summer, partly as a result of his success in making instantaneous views.

The Petoskey Drawing Company appeared in "Damon and Pythias" at the Opera House last evening, and will appear tonight in "Lost in London."

Mr. Ferguson is building a neat cottage on his lot west of A. Butter's residence on Mason street. John Burns and Alex Cameron are doing the carpenter work.

County Clerk S. B. Thatcher, who is also village president at Boyne, looking after the duties of his offices and the pleasure of his friends.

Stockman & Iddings have a new advertisement this week in which besides their general hardware, they call attention to a number of specialties in their line. Save your dollar.

The yacht Norden was in the harbor over Sunday with a party of thirteen, mostly druggists, from down the shore, on their way to Petoskey to attend the state association.

The state pharmaceutical association is in session at Petoskey this week. A large number of the members came over to Charlevoix yesterday on an excursion, as guests of Dr. Crouter.

The usual large peel of tan bark is now being shipped at Charlevoix. The wharf at Carpenter, Bartholomew & Co., is kept piled full the greater of the time. They ship several cargos every week.

Will Lewis of Boyne, has about 300 speckled brook trout confined in a section of the river at the rear of his lot that he is justly proud of, some of which are the largest ever caught in this region.

The excursion season has commenced, and more people will visit the Pine Lake region than ever before. The tourist who misses seeing this region will have something to regret all his lifetime.

One of the most scholarly sermons we have ever listened to, was by Rev. J. D. Parmelee in the Congregational church last Sunday morning. Mr. Parmelee is pastor of the Swedenborg or New Church, at Wilmington, Del. While we are not versed in the doctrines he promulgates, yet this sermon for the beautiful exposition of the bible truths warranted much commendation.

We call attention to the illustrated advertisement of L. D. Bartholomew & Co. The cuts for these illustrations are engraved by F. S. Blanchard of that firm, who seems to have a correct conception of the value of of advertising.

Geo. E. Stockbridge, of the resort, has purchased one of Jos. Beauvais banjiaume row boats, and has named it Julia S. This is one that Joe built a year ago and is of seventeen kinds of wood of different color, worked in handsome design.

Mrs. R. M. Mabee and Mrs. A. T. Stewart have opened a bakery in a new building recently built near the Inwood building on Bridge street, and they will keep a fresh stock of home made bread, pies and cake, and also dispense ice cream.

Charlevoix and Boyne City are getting the ball fever and will have good clubs in the field soon—provided the fever is not subdued when the call is made for cash.—Independent. The cash is already up, and Charlevoix has a team in the field that will make the best club in northern Michigan get to the front to down them.

A meeting of the board of directors of the Detroit, Charlevoix & Escanaba railroad was held at Cheboiyea, Tuesday, July 12th, at which much important business was transacted. All of the members of the board were present except one, and he was represented by proxy. Committees were appointed along the line to procure rights of way. Messrs. Nicholls, Blessby, and Drake were instructed to visit Detroit, and Messrs. Cherrie and Meech were instructed to visit New York and other places east, to confer with railroad men in the interest of the D.C. & E.R.R. The secretary was also instructed to advertise for bids on the work of chopping grubbing and grading. The committees instructed to visit Detroit and the east will probably leave Monday on their respective mission. It is the intention of the directors to push the work on this road to completion as soon as it is possible.

Fortify the system by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, against the diseases peculiar to hot weather. This medicine induces a healthy action of the stomach, liver, and kidneys, causing them to prevent the accumulation of the poisons which produce disease.

Coming Events.

Remember the gospel meeting at the opera house Sunday evening.

There will be preaching at the Congregational church Sunday morning at 10:30 o'clock.

Preaching next Sunday at 3 o'clock p. m. at Blacks school house. At 8 o'clock, at Johnson's school house. Sunday school at each place at the usual hour.

Brother Sayles, the Singing Evangelist, is coming among us again. He will be here two weeks resting and enjoying himself. He will hold a gospel meeting at the hall on Sunday evening, July 17, and a bible reading on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday afternoon at 4 o'clock sharp, at the Congregational church. A gospel meeting on Sunday evening, July 24, at the hall, and bible reading at the M. E. church on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday at 4 p. m. sharp. A gospel meeting at the hall on Sunday evening, July 31st, will close the services. We hope all our citizens will avail themselves of this opportunity of studying the word under the leadership of Brother Sayles. The meeting will be varied by songs and choruses. No collection. All are invited.

Arrangements have been made by which a concert will be given at the opera hall, Tuesday evening, July 19th, under the auspices of the ladies of the Congregational church, by the following artists: Mr. and Mrs. Frank McGibeny of the celebrated McGibeny Family Concert Company, and the celebrated Davis sisters of Boston, Mass. The two former artists are well known to most any extended concert. They are spending their vacation at Petoskey. They have been through the entire west and northwest this last year including all the largest cities of the Pacific coast and have proved their ability to Charlevoix people before. The Davis sisters are not so well known in this part of the country, but have an enviable reputation in the east in musical and social circles. Miss Julia C. Davis is a contralto of great compass and power and sings in one of the largest churches in Boston. Miss Josephine Davis has a pure soprano voice of great brilliancy and range and is a pupil of the Boston conservatory. The concert will consist of music, both vocal and instrumental and reading, and will be an entertainment of such a character that all can attend with propriety and be entertained. The price of admission will be 35 cents reserved seats, and 25 cents to other parts of the hall.

Base Ball.

Charlevoix is fully alive to the all absorbing sport of the day, base ball, and don't propose to get left. The organization is perfected with a corps of efficient officers with substantial backing; and it is proposed to make every game a good one,—one worth going a long way to witness. The first game of the season was played at Charlevoix the Fourth, with Boyne, resulting in a score of 17 to 4 in favor of Charlevoix.

The second play took place at Boyne last Tuesday with the Boyne team, resulting as follows:

Innings	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Charlevoix	2	0	5	1	0	2	1	0	*-11
Boyne	1	0	0	2	0	1	1	0	0-5

OFFICERS.

President—Geo. W. Crouter.
Vice President—Fred W. Mayne.
Secretary—Day Meech.

Boyne

Tuesday July 12, was a big day at Boyne. Early in the day people began gathering in from the country to celebrate the Battle of the Boyne. Steamers Gordon and Clara Bell were crowded from Charlevoix two trips, the Cummings had a full load from East Jordan and Ironton, and the Friant and Van Raalte brought a large number from Harbor Springs and Petoskey, so that before noon the streets were well filled. Care had been taken to make the village as beautiful as possible in readiness for a large gathering and a good time, by lining the streets with evergreens and decorations. At one o'clock the procession formed near Perkins store, headed by several martial bands, and with flags and banners flying, marched to the village park on the north side of the Boyne river, where the exercises took place. Barnard Burns, District Master L. O. I., called the throng to order and opened the program by a short address, declaring in a few chosen words the object of the order. This address was followed by prayer by Rev. W. R. Norton. Rev. Adam Clark then addressed the people about forty minutes, speaking in an earnest yet pleasing manner, reviewing the early history of the Protestants and Catholics of Eng land and Ireland, the persecutions of the Protestants, and their progress, and the final victory of protestantism over Catholicism, which occurred July 1690, and in memory of which the Orangemen celebrate July 12, wearing orange colors in allusion to William III, Prince of Orange. Short speeches were also made by W. Watson, Rev. Mr. Thurston and Rev. Mr. Hacket, which were interesting and instructive.

After 3 o'clock attention was given to the game of base ball.

Lecture on Egypt.

Mr. J. S. Smithson will deliver a lecture upon Egypt in the Opera House on Wednesday evening, July 27th for the benefit of the M. E. church repairs. This lecture was compiled from observations made by Mr. Smithson during his travels in the east, and its popularity in the leading cities of the United Kingdom has been attested by the immense audiences of cultured people who have been entertained and instructed by it.

Mr. Smithson has at considerable trouble and expense secured several costumes of the different classes of the Egyptian people, which he will exhibit in the course of the lecture, showing the unique form of Oriental dress with much better effect than any description could make possible.

Among the many characters impersonated in genuine Oriental costumes will be a shepard, brigand, Dervish (howling) Priest, bride, bedouin, peasant and working men and women and a variety of others with a few curiosities.

Eveline.

100° in the shade two days last week.

John Dunlop, who has been in the employ of the Pine Lake Iron Co. since last last fall, returned to his farm last Thursday.

John Smith is on the sick list this week.

The family of J. V. Lane, who have been on the sick list the past two week's have now recovered.

T. Bishop and wife, of this place, for resisting an officer on June 29th, were last week bound over by Justice Garbutt, of Boyne City for trial at the next term of circuit court.

Mr. Fairbanks, of Traverse City, was at Ironton one day last week.

Picking potato bugs is part of the order of the day. There is an abundance of them this year.

Our farmers are about all busy taking care of their hay, which is an unusually large crop.

Miss Anna Brandeu is home from Norwood again, for a short stay.

The furnace shut down one day last week, for want of wood. The Bob Stephenson is kept busy all the time towing scows of wood, but can not keep it fast enough to keep the furnace going, as they use about 130 cords per day. The furnace will start up again this week sometime.

July 12.

South Hayes.

Haying is nearly done.

Mr. McDermott has built a new board fence along the front of his farm, which adds greatly to the beauty of the place.

Peter McNally is busily at work finishing his new house.

Mr. Geo. Fields is at work for W. E. Bedwin during haying and harvesting.

Mrs. S. Martin is quite sick this week.

Master George Newson left for Chicago one day last week, where he intends to remain for some time.

Miss Jessie Whitman, who spent a few days in Charlevoix last week is again in Hayes.

July 12th.

Burgess.

Mrs. Kane, of Genesee, arrived today to visit her sons, Peter and Frank Kane, and will spend the summer.

John Strathers has returned to St. Ignace.

Mr. Goodrich is holding a series of evening schools for the benefit of the large scholars who are deprived of the day school; and all speak in the highest praise with his progress.

BESIDE THE RIVER.

BY WILLIAM O. PATTER.

Here beside the river
We stood a year ago;
Merrily danced the waters,
As I walked with dear Zoe.

Hand in hand we lingered
Beneath a waning sky;
Swiftly flowed the waters,
As I walked with dear Zoe.

Sweetly sang a robin
Upon a willow tree;
The waters softly murmured
A sighing song of love.

Now beside the river
I stand alone, alone!
Sorrowfully sound the waters
As at my feet they moan!

TRUE TO HIS TRUST.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

Many of the readers of this narrative will easily recall to mind the late Mr. Abel Symington. For almost fifty years no face and figure were better known upon the streets of this great city than his; and his daily life, his kind, winning demeanor, and his frequent charities, caused his name always to be spoken with respect and esteem. At the time of which I am about to write he was in his sixties year. His form was still erect and his step elastic. His face was a perfect index of the excellence of his character and the greatness of his heart, as well as of the vigorous intellect of the accomplished man of business. I do not wish to overtax this picture, but I must be finish it with the remark that was often made by his friends and intimates—namely, that Mr. Symington came as near being a perfect character as was permitted to humanity.

Perhaps I am partial; but that is natural. He was my benefactor; to his kindness I owe all that I have become in life. Left a penniless orphan, my home at the age of eight was in a charitable institution of which he was a director. Something—I shall never know what—attracted his attention to me, among the two hundred inmates, upon one of his frequent visits. His inquiries about me were soon followed by my transfer to his own house. I believe I was not adopted, in the formal sense in which the word is used. I still retained my own name, Lambert Wade; but I was an inmate of my patron's house, and was never made to feel that I was dependent upon his bounty. His wife had died some years before, leaving an infant daughter, Mildred, who was six years younger than myself. A maiden sister had the care of his house, and we four, with the servants, made the household. Later on, another member was added to it, who will presently be introduced.

Time had passed until I was seventeen years old. I had attended the graded schools, graduating in the academic department with some honor. The winter following found me fully installed in Mr. Symington's office as his clerk and assistant. He carried on a large real estate and loan business, which it was said his great capacity had doubled within the last fifteen years. Aside from the skilled part of the work, there were large ledgers to keep, letters to write, and much clerical labor to do. All this he had usually attended to himself for the reason that he could not find a clerk who exactly suited him. Many were tried, and after a trial were kindly dismissed. It seemed to me at this time that he was too exacting in this matter; but a letter might into his ways led me to a different opinion. Next after honorable dealing and industry as I told you with his own lips, one day, his great success in business was due to care and precision in all its methods, and he could not bear a slovenly or careless assistant. If I could be the him, it was certainly not thrown away on me. Added to my strong desire to be of service to him, and with a natural liking for the work, I speedily mastered all its minor details; and it was a high gratification to me, you think all this part of the business" was soon handed over to me, and that I was largely relieving Mr. Symington by the steadiness with which I kept my desk. My reference as to how I could be of greater service to me at this time to make a request of him; which he immediately granted. In explanation of this, a few words about the arrangement of the building in which the office was situated become necessary.

It was a small brick, two-story structure, which had been built by Mr. Symington more than thirty years before, and used by him for his business ever since. The whole of the first-story was occupied by the outer and inner offices. From the inner office a stairway ascended to a small room, which, as I had been informed, Mr. Symington had used for his lodging before his marriage. It was now not to no use. From this room, without any intervening hall or passage, there was a door opening into a store-room, which occupied the rest of the upper story. It was half filled with the disused carpets, chairs, mattrasses, and stove-pipe which had from time to time been brought up here from the office. My plan was to have the vacant chamber in the rear simply furnished for my use, so that I could store there instead of at the house.

About the first of June of that year Walter Brand came to visit Mr. Symington. I had never heard of him before, and now learned that he was the son of an elder sister who lived in a distant city. Walter was a very dashing, stylish young man of nineteen, who wore the most fashionable clothes, and seemed intent only on having what he called "a good time." No one who saw him could help admiring his upright figure, his regular features, bright eyes, and curly, black hair, and his hearty laugh, which had an infection of mirth in it. Two persons who were now rolling externally than plain Lambert Wade and handsome Walter Brand, it would be impossible to find. I felt attracted by his appearance, and made efforts to gain his friendship. To my surprise and mortification, he repelled all of them. His conversation, with me was cold, and on one occasion we did several times each day, was of the briefest; and more than once he gave me a decided snub. His treatment pained me, and I have to confess, made me feel a loss to account for it. His looks and manner showed me plainly that my work was have told it, that he was angered to find another person occupying a position to which he had aspired in his uncle as I did. Glad and thankful at the time of the arrival of this visitor when I became aware of a change in the usual demeanor of Mr. Symington. He was as paternal and industrious as ever at the office; but his face was often troubled, he appeared more thoughtful, and he talked less with me in the intervals of business. Being very little, at the house now save at meal times, I had not a fair opportunity to judge of his nephew was connected with his unkindness; but I certainly suspected it. My suspicions were entirely correct. About half-past five one afternoon, as I was writing at my desk in the outer office, and Mr. Symington was in his inner office, reading paper in the inner room, Walter came in, and in a tone which was almost abrupt enough to be rude, asked for his uncle, merely pointed with my pen to the private office, and went on with my work.

I could not see either of them; indeed, my eyes were not raised from the book before me, I was making my entries; but there were ears to my attentive.

"Uncle, please let me have fifty dollars."

"Why, Walter! You asked me for so much as that, and got it, only a few days ago."

"Yes, but—well, you were young yourself once, uncle, and you know that a young fellow can't have any fun in a big city like this without money."

"I thought you had plenty of money."

"Let me come in," he said. "I want to speak to you."

He followed me into the private office and sat down. I stood before him, waiting for him to speak.

"I haven't treated you well, Lambert," he said.

"I'm glad that you know it," was my reply, and it is small matter. You have injured another more deeply."

He looked anxiously in my face; he must have seen there detection, discovery, condemnation!

"How did you find it out?" he asked in a hoarse whisper.

"It was very simple. On one of the fingers of the hand from which I struck the dark lantern I saw the large seal-ring, with the blue onyx stone, that you wear."

"It is all over with me, then," he said. "I had suffered the torments of the damned since that hour! I hoped you did not know; I shook off that ruffian, and walked the streets, with my conscience smiting me at every step, praying God that if this last horrible sin did not find me out, I would repent and reform. I did not do it for me. Go for an officer, I have not strength to escape, if I wished to. Send me to the penitentiary; I deserve it."

If you knew what you have just said, Walter, I shall not go for a policeman."

He looked up again.

"You don't mean that, Lambert. You can't forgive what I have done."

"I can and will; but that is the least part of it. You must go to your uncle and tell him all. I will go with you.

"No, not that! I can't do it. I can't give him such a blow! I can't look him in the face and tell him that I yielded to the temptation of such dreadful wickedness and degradation. No, no! I can't do it, I know! For God's sake, Lambert, don't tell him!"

"Go home, then, and begin a new life."

"He shook his head sadly.

"I dare not. My father is a stern man, different from Uncle Abel. I cannot meet him after my disgrace and crime.

"There is another chance for you. Get loose from your evil companions; go where you are not known; keep to your good resolutions, work hard, and all will be well.

His eyes were downcast; he seemed humiliated to the dust as he told me the obstacle to this course. A very brief struggle decided me. I went up to my chamber, and returning, placed five dollars in his hand. It was half of my little savings.

"You are welcome to it, Walter—all may God help you to be a man! Your secret is safe with me; your uncle will never know it till you choose to tell him."

The tears rolled down his face he threw his arms around my neck and sobbed upon my shoulder. Then he hastened from the office and the city; and for ten years I did not see him again.

My mind was not wholly at rest in regard to the abstraction from the safe of the events of that morning, which I had promised Walter. In fact, it was a serious lunion to me for weeks. The path of duty did not seem plain, and I passed more than one sleepless night over it. In the end, however, Mr. Symington as I did, I persuaded myself that he, in my place, would do as I was doing. For nine years his example had been before me, and it seemed to me a forgiveness of the erring, in the lifting up and strengthening of those who had fallen. He was my father in this, and I felt that in observing his life I had really wished to follow his precepts and example.

It was not long after the disappearance of Walter that Uncle Abel became ill. He was not sick, he was lame, and was confined to his room. Dr. Symington, who was the family physician, was at his bedside almost every day, and I was my pattern as well as my patron, and in observing his life I really wished to follow his example.

Leaves the luxury of doing good.

It was not long after the disappearance of Walter that letters began to reach us from him. In a few months, he had commenced his new life, and was manfully struggling with handicaps lost. Soon, he was writing cheerfully of new friends and business connections, and hopes of substantial success, and in time our hearts were gladdened by the news of his wealth and civic honors. Ten years bring changes to everybody; and when Walter, his wife and boy made us their long-promised visit, they found that I had become Mr. Symington's business ally, and was in principal charge of the business. It was not until the day before the visit ended that the memorable scene occurred which I have described at the opening of this narrative. Walter had gone to the depot to purchase it and ride proudly down Main street, and Uncle Abel, the sanguinity of manhood, and other Americans! I write this letter with my arm in a sling and a piece of bicycle in my back.

My Experience With a Bicycle.

If there was any one of my various accomplishments that, by my younger days, I was proud of, it was my horseback riding; and, when the wild, swift, gliding bicycle, with its fascinating smile and curved form, came promising into civilization, I rushed to purchase it and ride proudly down Main street. Alas! for the sanguinity of manhood, and other Americans! I write this letter with my arm in a sling and a piece of bicycle in my back.

FARM AND GARDEN.

HOW TO MAKE A COMBINATION HEDGE AND BARB WIRE FENCE.

A Flowering Plant Recommended by Vick for Everybody—A Grain Elevator Useful for Hoisting Various Products with Small Labor and Expense.

Progressive farmers are learning the wisdom of letting the brain lead the hand; in a word, they find there are some forces not pay to make three motions where one will answer. To save every useless expenditure of muscular strength, as well as every minute of time, these men investigate each labor saving device as it appears, and especially when it proves simple and practicable.

GRAIN ELEVATOR.

Exceedingly tiresome work in the busy days of threshing is that of hoisting grain in the granary, and help in this direction is therefore welcome. The first figure here given represents an elevator which a Rural New Yorker correspondent claims is simple to construct and effective in its operations. The diagram is explained as follows: A A A, 2x4 inch scantling; sills, 1x6 or 8 inch; cc, small wooden friction wheels to run against inside of scantling; D, inch flooring; E, screw hook; FF, sills, 2x4 or 6 inches.

UNLOADING THE GRAIN.

The second sketch shows the elevator in operation. The loaded wagon has been backed up to the elevator, which rested on a platform level with the wagon. The bags are placed on the elevator and the horse instantly raises it to the second floor, where men receive them and empty them into the bins. One hundred bushels can be quickly unloaded by this device, and without any straining or unnecessary lifting. This elevator may be made with saw, hammer and nails, or it may be more ingenuously built.

A Plant for Everybody.

"The freesia, a bulbous plant, is one that, according to the well known Jerdan, Vick, will bloom in any window with the least care, and is therefore a plant for everybody. The flowers are pure white, with the exception of an orange yellow spot at the base of each of the lower divisions. These are very graceful in form, and with a rich and abundant fragrance. The fan represents the flowers at about half size, the bulb at the left being about natural size.

FREESIA—A PLANT FOR ALL.

By potting the bulbs about the middle of September they can be brought into bloom for the Christmas holidays. A succession supply of the flowers can be kept up through the winter by potting a few at intervals of two weeks all through the autumn.

The bulbs increase more than double every year. During the resting season there is no better way to keep them than to leave them in the pots where they have flowered, keeping them quite dry, for if they are moistened they will commence to grow.

The following directions are given in Vick's Magazine: A soil composed of loam, leaf mold and well decayed manure and a little sand, such as is commonly used for potting, is suitable; half a dozen bulbs can be set in a four inch pot, filling the soil about them to their tips, or just to cover them. Give water and set them in a cool place in the greenhouse, conservatory or window. They do not need much heat, a temperature of 50 degrees being plenty. They should be near the glass, and not be kept too close, but having air and be frequently in favorable weather, given frequently a little fresh air, care being allowed as the blossoming season approaches.

A Foot Disease in the Horse.

In the disease called laminitis, a foot founder in the horse, Professor P. A. A. Grange of the Agricultural college of Michigan, in a bulletin on the subject, compares the pain endured by the animal to that of an individual from the tooth-ache, both arising from the same cause. In toothache we have a highly sensitive structure called the pulp inclosed in an unyielding case of bone, the root or fang. Now when from any cause swelling occurs from inflammation of the pulp, the nerve is pressed upon, but being imprisoned in the fang it can gain no more room for relief by expansion than it has in its normal condition of health. In the case of the horse the seat of the disease is in the delicate and highly sensitive little plates called laminæ surrounding the inside of the hoof, which being also an unyielding substance, it necessarily follows that when these sensitive little plates become inflamed and swollen within the unyielding hoof intense pain to the animal is the result. The disease is commonly found in the forefeet only, and when both are affected, as they usually are, the animal will stand while he generally found with its back arched and hind feet drawn forward toward the center of the body, causing many to think it is strained across the loins. The animal thus affected, when required to move, does so in an unwilling, stumbling way. The pulse has a full, throbbing feeling and is some what quickened and can be felt on the outside of the leg, near the fetlock, and the breathing is accelerated. The principal causes of the disease are immoderate drinking of cold water when the animal is overheated; overfeeding of grain, especially of corn, and overdriving on a hard road.

In cases where the disease is caused by acute attacks of diarrhoea or excessive use of purgative medicines, as it is sometimes, the professor found benefit from the use of tincture of aconite in doses of ten to fifteen drops in a little water, every two hours until four or five doses have been taken, to be followed by two drachms doses of nitrate of potash dissolved in half a pint of water and given once in four hours for from two to four days as may be required. On the other hand, if the disease arises from a surfeit of grain, the bowels should be unloaded by laxatives, say twenty-five fluid ounces of raw linseed oil, and no solid food for twenty-four hours afterward. When laxatives have done acting, nitrate of potash may follow as before. Where it is the result of overdriving on hot days, great benefit has been found from nitrate of potash. Local treatment is of great importance, and consists in the application of water to the feet in a manner the most convenient. Standing in water or in a puddle of blue clay and water are stated as having been useful. Exercise should be given from the first, from ten minutes to half an hour as a tissic.

Hedges in a New Position.

The introduction of barb wire fences has placed the business of planting hedges in a new position. It has rendered these less necessary, and at the same time more easily constructed and made more perfect. It was formerly necessary to select some low thick growing tree or shrub, well armed with thorns to make them effectual barriers, and for a time the most commonly planted kinds were the osage orange and the honey locust. The osage orange was too tender in many of the northern states, and the honey locust, while hardy, is straggling in growth, and requires continual cutting back to thicken it.

Now, with the use of barb wires, it is not necessary to select thorny plants. One of the best is the buckthorn, which formerly was too scentenough for a trustworthy barrier against cattle.

BARB WIRE AND HEDGE FENCE.

It is perfectly hardy, thick and hedge-like in growth, easily raised from seed, transplanted with facility, and, having an offensive taste, is not browsed by cattle. It is made into a strong barrier by straightening a bed wire along the top of the line of plants when they are a foot or two high, and when they have grown up and inclosed the wire, by stretching another a foot or more above the first. If necessary, a third wire may be used still higher; and as the hedge inclosed these wires they are more securely held in their place than could be done by using a line of stakes, as the temporary stakes having performed their service. For durability, the wire should be galvanized, not painted.

The privet would make an excellent hedge treated in this way were it not for the fact that it is occasionally winter killed in patches. The barberry is another plant which may be employed, and the seed if properly treated will grow as freely as apple seed.

The illustration shows how a line of young Norway spruces are treated. They are represented about two feet in height, the first or lowest wire being already inclosed by them and the second one placed just above the tips. The third one will be reached in a year or two more. The hedge will need cutting back afterward to keep it within bounds—not sheared like a wall, but cut with a knife to give it a more uneven and natural surface.—Country Gentleman.

Feeding for Milking Tests.

High priced cows that are fed for milking tests are induced to eat and drink all they will of sound, wholesome food and clean pure water. Silage and roots are largely fed as supplemental food, the idea being that these keep the animal's system in good, healthy condition. Sliced carrots form one of the favorite foods for milch cows. In addition to rations of roots are given generous quantities of clover, hay and grain.

Facts Worth Knowing.

At the New York dairy show not a single milking invention was on exhibition. The inference is that none have yet been invented which does the work like the human hand.

The favorite butter package appears to be a light round box, a number of which can be inclosed in a heavy iron bound box or light crate.

A census taker of Ohio in 1884 found that in one township where no agricultural papers were taken the average price of butter was 19 2-3 cents. In another where 214 papers were taken, the price of butter was 23 1-3 cents.

Oats and peas are an old time crop being revived nowadays.

Remember that seeds of pumpkins, cucumbers or melons cannot be relied upon to reproduce themselves exactly when planted side by side.

A poor tool on the farm imposes a tax upon the user every day it is employed, often greater by far than the whole price of a good tool.

The best floor for poultry is one has a tight or close one.

The May crop report from the department at Washington indicates a falling off in the condition of wheat of a little more than two points since April 1, the general average of condition being 85.8 against 88.1 it's previous month.

Perils of Photography.

In the year 2887 nobody will be proud of his ancestors. There will be claims of long descent, and people instead of constantly alluding to their forefathers, the pioneers of 1849, the passengers of the original "Mayflower" will carefully avoid all mention of them. Why? Because when any such allusion is made the nouveau riche will ask to inspect the family album, and the photographs of this century will simply be discreditable.

Do you ever open the old album and look over the pictures? Well, the old folks—your father and mother—always look well, for don't you know, parents are always old-fashioned. But there's your aunt, with a coal-scuttle bonnet and hoops, and her hair pasted down over her forehead and parted in the middle; with a kind of jaundice complexion and bright eyes, that show in their pupils nothing but the excited, intense interest of trying to look into the camera for fifty seconds without winking. And you thought she was so pretty then, and you remember as a child when you went and told your mother you saw her being kissed by her beau at the garden-gate. There there's our beau, who afterward married her. He was so handsome, don't you know. Look at him. He wears a long frock coat with lapels that curl up under his arms; he has a flaming necktie and a shirt front as wide as that to where the coat looks as if it were tied by a string tight around the waist. His trousers don't fit, and his face is all covered with yellow specks, and he looks as if he had swallowed a fly and it was in dying agonies in his windpipe, while he daren't cough for fear of spoiling the picture. Then he's your father. Well, that's not so bad. You know you were very pretty as a child, and you remember the dress, and—well, you're not quite so old-fashioned—to yourself—as the others. And you turn the page. There's Fred, whom you jilted. You look at him and you're glad you jilted him. He used to be so beautifully pensive. Now he looks like an idiot, and—well you doubt if he ever could have been so horrid, any way. Then your husband comes along and turns the book over and says: "Do you remember that?" You close it on his fingers; it's fearful! You have an old-fashioned, shapeless, black silk gown that looks like gingham, or something with wide sleeves and big ruffles, and the skirt is gracefully bunched out like a half-exhausted balloon. And you've had the picture painted, and the beautiful red of your cheeks has become mottled, and the neck is yellow, and the hair is a dirty-brown color, and you've got half your wardrobe of a green chair. And your husband wonders what he ever could see in you, until you show him his own picture. Then he shuts up suddenly, like a knife, don't you know.—Peck's Sun.

THIS GOOD OLD STAND-BY
accomplishes greater cures than any other remedy ever introduced for it. One of the reasons for the great popularity of the Mustang Liniment is the fact that it never fails in its usefulness. Everybody needs such a medicine.
The Farmer needs it for his family and stock.
The Housewife needs it for general family use.
The Canal Driver and Boatman need it.
The Mechanic needs it always on his work bench.
The Miner needs it in case of emergency.
The Plantation Overseer—can't do without it.
The Farmer needs it in his house, his stable, and his stock yard.
The Steamboat man or the Boatman needs it on Rivers, Lakes and Canals.
The Horse-fancier feels it is his best friend and constant companion.
The Stock-grower needs it in his stock and Shepherds of his flocks and herds.
The Railroad man needs it and will need it so long as his life is exposed to accidents and dangers.
The Backwoodsman needs it. There is nothing like it as an antidote for the dangers in life, limb and health which surround the pioneer.
The Merchant needs it when he sees among his employees Accidents will happen, and when Boss sees the Mustang Liniment on the premises, he knows he is in the House, "Tis the best of money."

Some Opinions of Charlevoix, as Expressed by Our Friends.

One of the Quiet Retreats of Northern Michigan.

The Grand Rapids Daily Democrat of July 10th has t e following from a special correspondent: [For a bird's-eye view of Charlevoix and the harbor and summer resorts, see the last page of this paper.]

Charlevoix, quiet, simple and delightful; her hills and shores clad in a raiment of green, and the atmosphere perfect, not a whit too warm or a whit too cool, and of such invigorating propensities that the cheek, faded and wan by reason of a winter's season of social dissipation, blushes under its influence and the lungs expand and the entire system undergoes a marked change by which disease and ill-health suffer signal defeat. Here the resorter finds the ideal haven of rest. The loud, shrill whistle of the locomotive has never broken the silence and peace of this sequestered spot, yet the place is alive with business and growing rapidly. But the roar and roll of the railway train grind our way to the noiseless glide of the steamer which comes in from Lake Michigan, entering Pine River, and when the great, lazy draw-bridge has been opened, moves rapidly to the docks at the rear of the town. No resort in Michigan has such charming water fronts as has Charlevoix. On the Lake Michigan side the grass and tree lined shore rises abruptly from the water edge as if to protect the beautiful chain of lakes which here begin their romantic windings through the hills and valleys and through the forests. Pine river cuts the town in twain and runs but a quarter of a mile when it swells into a broad and capacious bay, yes, and even the ponds of residences are very conspicuous and beautiful along its banks. Narrowing but for a short distance, again the river suddenly runs broadly and then broadens out and becomes a part and parcel of Pine Lake, which extends some 12 miles away. The main street of Charlevoix is Bridge street, broad and smooth, lined on either side by stores and blocks occupied by the various branches of the industrial world. Covering the sidewalks in many places are large trees swelling out in graceful proportions and protecting the pedestrians from the sun's rays. Continuing on Bridge street, up the bluff the ground is high and level and occupied by several dwellings which in their cottage style of architecture make the scene beautiful and sheerfully confident with a prevailing holiday air. Longfellow avenue is the first of the many avenues that reached on the bluff and is a very beautiful thoroughfare. Of "Charlevoix Summer Resort," a resort which is a very picture with its quaint cottages. This famous resort is where the Baptist folks come for a pleasure during the summer and is operated and largely owned by Kalamazooites, though of course there are many others from all parts of the country." The cottages are all solid and substantial, without being bulky and awkward. They are unique, both in designing and painting, eye, and the grounds which the cottages are known. There is a literary air about the place, judging from the names of some of the streets, which, by the way, would argue a decided taste for American authors. Longfellow, Bryant, Holmes, Dana, Carey (Alice and Phebe, probably), Whittier, Carlton, Tennyson, Gray and Longfellow avenues and Lowell park are specimens of the names to quaint little streets running about the place. Fronting the grounds is the above mentioned Pine lake, which covers a thousand different acres, and is for some distance gradually and in places quite rocky, rising so that the entire shore can be traversed on foot. At a very gradual slope the sand covered beach runs out at the children's bathing grounds at the terminus of Longfellow avenue the water can be and at any depth from an inch to two feet, so that it is perfectly safe for the little people to bathe and disport on the sands. And they do both there, and with a will, too. It is as good as a picnic to see the little tots who represent all ages of childhood, from the three-year-old to the younger of 15, in queer looking suits, splashing in the water and running along the beach, their little bare feet leaving imprints in the sand like Friday did of yore.

It is worth a trip to Charlevoix to take a sail around Pine lake in one of the clinker built boats that are easily procurable. Not only does it present well finished landscape, but the streams and brooks leading into it are fairly alive with fish. The lake is large enough to make sailing a pleasure; but if there are any who consider it too small for their purposes then Lake Michigan, with its white caps dancing and foaming in the sun, will give all the opportunities in the world to exercise an active or latent ability for sailorizing.

The ill-fated Champlain is lying in the harbor above the draw bridge, charred and blackened from the flames that swept over it on that fateful night a few weeks ago, that so many lives were lost and so many homes made sad and lonely. The scenes enacted on that horrible night are still fresh in the minds of the villagers, who point out to visitors here and there spots made memorable by its connection with the tragedy of the lake.

There is considerable business done here and the stores present an active appearance during the day and evening. No railroad runs here as yet, though one is in progress of construction to connect at Kalkaska. It will run through the Intermediate lake region and stop at

A SIX-YEAR-OLD boy in Alleghany City, Pa., who was sick in bed, was almost smothered the other day by a cat sucking his breath. When the boy's mother tried to drive the animal away it showed fight and bit her. It was finally driven off by stabbing it with a pair of shears.

THE police force of New York City, according to the latest report, numbers 3,416 men, of whom 2,731 are patrolmen, 168 roundsmen, 76 sergeants, and the rest superior officers. The commissioners urge a substantial addition to the force on the ground that during the last six years the population has increased 27 per cent., as against only 14 per cent. increase in the police.

COUNT KALNOKY is known in St. Petersburg as a man of few words, not accustomed to thrash out leader, but certain to do what he says. He dislikes publicity, but he mingles a great deal in society and goes several times a week to the opera. He is particularly cheerful in company, is a brilliant conversationalist and linguist, speaks most irreproachable English, and has great charm of manner.

REV. HUGH O. PENTECOST, of Newark, N. J., who has been blackballed by a social club, composed of clergymen, for his adoption of Henry George's theories, is a brother of George H. Pentecost, the famous revivalist. Hugh Pentecost married Ida Gatling, the handsome and fascinating daughter of Dr. Gatling, inventor of the famous revolving gun. Both the Pentecosts are eloquent speakers, and possess a remarkable amount of personal magnetism.

MR. RUSKIN doesn't like bicycles. "I not only object," he says, "but am quite prepared to spend all my best bad language in reprobation of bicycles and 4-5-6 or 7-cycles, and every other contrivance and invention for superseding human flesh on God's ground. To walk, to run, to leap, and to dance are the virtues of the human body, and neither to stride on stilts, wriggle on wheels, nor dangle on ropes, and nothing in the training of the human mind with the body will ever supersede the appointed God's ways of slow walking and hard working."

S. S. MERRILL, the manager of the Milwaukee Road, who died lately, had a handy trick of knowing personally all the men on the road. He was loath to permit a man to remain in the service if he was unacquainted with him. When he came to make his California trip, a short time before his death, he called his lieutenants around him to give them final instructions. At last he asked them: "Is there anything more to be looked after?" "Huh!" jokins saw the opportunity for a joke on the old man's weakness and accepted it. "Well, Mr. Merrill," he said, "there's a new brakeman on the H. and D. Division that you ought to know before you leave."

IT is stated that the Treasury Department has abundant evidence that the demand for small silver certificates—denominations of one, two, and five dollars—is far from being supplied. The demand is fully up to the capacity of the department to supply, and the indications are all to the effect that months will elapse before the supplies issued from the mint of paper will cease. The official inference is said to be that the small certificates will continue to displace the silver dollars now in circulation, and that eventually all but a small number of these coins will return to the Treasury vaults, and their paper representatives will take their place in active circulation.

A CORRESPONDENT writing from Italy says: "I was passing through Turin a few weeks ago and had the good fortune to be taken by a friend to visit the widow Garibaldi. Her home is situated in a modest and quiet street; the hum from the leading thoroughfare can be but indistinctly heard. Her little sitting room is full of memorials of her beloved husband. The cabinets contain many medals, crosses, and orders, while the walls, on the occasion of my visit, were hung with flags of historic renown. The old lady appears to be wrapped up in memories of the past, and her conversation, turning on the career of the dead, bore, as was natural, a melancholy tinge."

A LOUISVILLE young man, who is traveling in Europe, writes to his people at home some points of his experiences in Scotland. He states his daily expenses for himself and companion do voyage at the Waverly Hotel, Glasgow, as follows: Bedroom, 24 cents; boots and service, 24 cents; breakfast, 54 cents; dinner, 46 cents; supper, 48 cents; total per diem, $1.96 for the two, against $3 to $4 at a Louisville hotel of the class for one person. Among his incidental price investigations in voyage at the "good" silk umbrella cost him $1.25, while the price of "a very fine one" was $2.93. Fine kid gloves for gentlemen were 50 cents a pair. The Glasgow street cars have stairways to the roof, and passengers have their choice of riding amidship or on the upper deck. The rains were continuous. A denizen being asked if it ever stopped raining, replied: "Yes, indeed; it sometimes snows!"

A VERY striking illustration of the effect upon travel of reducing fares is given by the experience of the Traction Company of Philadelphia, says the Detroit Free Press. Some time ago the fare on the street car lines belonging to that company was reduced from six to five cents a trip. The April returns show that the increase in the number of fares collected during the month was 678,218. The company has found the reduction both popular and profitable. The policy of reasonably reducing fares holds good on passenger transportation by steam as well as by horse car. Wherever tried the effect has been beneficial all around. Cheap rates turned a great tide of pleasure travel to California, and the railroads reaped large returns as a result. It is far more profitable for a railroad company to pull full cars at two cents per mile for each passenger than half-full ones at the three-cent rate. Cheaper fares make greater travel, just as cheaper postage leads to an increase in the volume of correspondence.

GOVERNOR HILL of New York has signed what is known as the Saturday half-holiday bill, which now becomes a law of the State. It makes a legal holiday of every Saturday from noon to midnight, and affects business in all respects so far as legal purposes are concerned. This law was brought about in response to a public sentiment that working men of all classes would be much benefited if there were fewer hours of toil in the week and more opportunities for rest and recreation. For the last few years the leading business houses of New York have been accustomed to close at noon on Saturdays during the summer months, and Broadway after 12 o'clock has been for months as quiet as Sunday, with all stores closed and clerks and other employes away enjoying a few hours of fresh air and out-door recreation. This new law is intended to make legal the observance of this half day, affecting banks and other places of business in which legal regulations prevail. Of course it does not make obligatory upon any the observance of a day, but it is the first step toward securing that end. Employers have come to learn that quite as much and quite as good work can be obtained from their employes by giving them a few hours extra rest each week as by trying them to the very limit of endurance without rest. The half-holiday will conduce greatly to the better observance of Sunday, and much of the desecration of the latter day will be avoided by the opportunity afforded for tired humanity to rest and enjoy out-door resorts on the preceding day. The half-holiday has come to stay. The idea is being introduced into all kinds of business where practicable the better it will be for all classes of society.

★ Turkish Cemeteries.

According to the Koran, the deceased is the owner of his grave in perpetuity, and the objectionable system of squeezing in a second occupant, so common in Christian lands, and in Constantinople, in Eyoub, and in Scutari, the room occupied by cemeteries is almost as extensive as that covered by dwellings. Within recent years it has been found necessary, in order to open roads that have been much needed, to curtail and even suppress some of the cemeteries; but it required an express order from the Sultan, which made the "ulemas" utter the wail of bigots. The cypress is pre-eminently the funeral tree. Each tomb has to have its own. And Turkish cemeteries become gloomy forests in time, which impart to certain Oriental landscapes an aspect singularly solid and sombre. It is upon the shore that these funeral forests are found in the greatest abundance. The trees, being nourished by the soil fertilized by human remains, reach a prodigious size and height. The largest and most celebrated of these cemeteries is that of Scutari, upon the Asiatic coast of the Bosphorus; it extends over more than six miles square. The tombstones are in the shape of an oval, wider at the top than on the bottom, and surmounted with a turban or fez, the form of which, varying greatly, indicates the rank of the deceased. A gilt inscription in Turkish characters, cut in relief on a blue background, gives the name and enumerates the virtues of the deceased, and implores divine mercy in his behalf. These stones are perpendicular, sometimes leaning very much. In the latter case a hole is dug at the base of the tomb, intended to catch rain for the little birds that come to quench their thirst. The dead are not buried very deep, and it is strange that the custom does not cause more sickness than it does. A large proportion of the epidemics of dysentery and typhoid fever that invade the low quarters of Constantinople can be traced to this custom. The proximity of the cadavers to the top of the ground produces, during the summer nights, particularly in swampy and damp cemeteries, a myriad of phosphorescent lights, which dance and flit around the tombs; and these myriad sparks of fire, while inspiring the poets also frighten the children.

THE LITTLE FOLKS.

A Lesson in Natural History.

"I suppose you think you know me, child," said he.
"But things are seldom what they seem to be.
Not long ago I was called a bird of lament,
I was given some information
Which I thought I should resent.
If you listen with a mind inclined,
"O, thank you, sir!" she said, in tones polite,
Though her teeth they chattered audibly with fright.
"Then give me your attention," he began,
"Don't wiggle your toes and don't fidget—
My history is long—
And Spencer Cincerum my clan.

"My customs, I may say, are quite nocturnal,
Though I'm not particularly proud of it for that;
"Tis my desire to be called a relative of owls—
My habits are carnivorous
And sometimes quite predatory,
To regards I especially threaten.

"My eyes are rather luminous, I own,
Which enables me to see in the night
"But if it would oblige you, I'm not weak.
My pupils are dilating.
But the lids are quivering,
Which enables me to give my noted blink.

"There is say that persons superstitious
Have me in a very unfavorable light
But you—regard me not with careless eyes!
Let me ask you to observe a
Final fact—that to Minerva
I am sacred—and I'm counted very wise."

"I think you very kindly, sir," said she,
"But all your Latin words are Greek to me;
Can't think me rude—you see a humble fowl,
And I much admire your feathers,
Your head is all wisdom,
But—excuse me!—are you not our common owl?"

Bright Eyes.

I had a good many pets in my boyish days, but none of them ever filled the place in my heart that Bright-eyes did. It was quite by accident that I came across him. I had gone with my father to market, and while he was busy buying berries and vegetables from the market women my roving eyes fell on something that I first looked at a good deal like a brown rat, in a cage held by a countryman on the other side of the street. Of course I hurried right off to see what it was, and much to my delight it proved to be a beautiful red squirrel, with a pair of the brightest, prettiest eyes in the world, and a tail that was simply superb. The countryman, seeing my interest, asked me if I didn't want to buy the squirrel. "He is perfectly tame," he said; and opening the door little Bright-eyes sprang out, and, running up on the man's shoulder, looked down at me so roguishly that I felt as though I would give the world to own him.

Just then my father came along, and I begged him to buy the squirrel for me.

"Tut-tut!" he objected; "what do you want with a squirrel? You would get tired of it in a week."

"Indeed I wouldn't," pleaded I, earnestly. "Just see what a beauty he is, and how cute! No fear or my getting tired of him."

We were right in front of the countryman now, and the squirrel, as if taking in what I had said, looked full at me, and the next moment sprang fearlessly on to my shoulder, whence he quickly scrambled down into my coat pocket, where I happened to have a bit of apple.

This settled the matter. Yielding to my entreaties, my father paid the price asked, and presently I was trudging homeward the happiest boy at the town, carrying my prize in the cage in which had been purchased early in the morning. Thus did little Bright-eyes, as he was at once christened, become an inmate of our household, where he gave us great delight and amusement for many months.

It is a very rare thing for a red squirrel to become thoroughly tame, but Bright-eyes was correspondingly proud of our pet. The secret of his perfect tractableness was that he belonged to a litter of baby squirrels which had been found by a farmer's son in an old tree, and taken into the house, where they were brought up in the constant presence of people, and consequently lost all fear of them. At first we kept his nest of the time in his cage, but little by little he was allowed greater liberty, until after a while he really spent more time running at large than shut up. He had just come to his full growth, and was in perfect condition, his fur being as smooth and soft as satin, his eyes as bright as diamonds, and his tail, which curled over his shoulder back in fine style, round, thick, and bushy enough to satisfy anybody. A more beautiful pet I never had or saw. One could watch him by the hour without getting weary of his antics. Creeping carefully along the mantel-piece, or leaping recklessly from chair to table, and from table to chair again; tearing across the carpet at the top of his speed, or scampering over the oil-cloth, with his sharp little toe-nails making such a pattering that you might imagine there were half a dozen of him; chattering with delight when he got hold of something to his liking, or scolding like a little fiend because he could not get into the sideboard, where, as he knew right well, the apples and nuts were kept; or lying in the sunshine on the sofa, and ten times more knowing—there is not room to tell one-half of his "tricks and his manners."

Bright-eyes seemed to have no preference among the apartments, for, indeed, to make any distinction between members of the family and visitors. All were his friends alike. Tiny as was his body, it had a heart big enough to take in all the world. Sometimes the readiness with which he enlarged his circle of acquaintance was rather startling to the visitor, as when, for instance, he would come quietly into the drawing room where my mother was receiving callers, leap suddenly up into a lady's lap, and dance spryly to her shoulder, or even to the top of her bonnet, before she knew what was up. Such success in evoking screams, that we began to suspect him of enjoying the diversion he created. Nothing this was giving him credit for a little more wit than he really possessed.

Dogs and cats were, of course, the terror of his life, and he had several narrow escapes from both, the latter almost gave him up for lost. He happened to be in my pocket when I went to the front door to see a friend, and becoming frightened at my friend's big setter, Bright-eyes foolishly ran into the street instead of into the house. The dog immediately made hot chase after him, while I frant cally pursued the dog, full of fear as to the result. Circumstances, however, came to my force going very far, dodged into a corner so narrow that his burly enemy could not follow, and I rescued him panting.

When studying at my desk I used to allow him to play freely about, until he developed such a fondness for putting his nose and fore-paws into the ink-bottle, and then scampering off over the place, leaving his autograph on everything he touched, that I was compelled to banish him from the room. He generally had the run of the sitting-room during the evening, and yet in his cage before we went to bed. He very decidedly disliked being shut up, and would often hide just before the time came, so that it would be quite a job to hunt him out. As a rule he was found, but several times he succeeded in eluding our search, and so sure as he did, about an hour after all were in bed and the house wrapped in silence, Bright eyes' little feet would be heard pit-pattering over the hall oilcloth, up the stairs, and round about the rooms, until somebody took him into bed, where he would snuggle peacefully until morning. It was just in this way, as I shall presently tell, that my poor little pet lost his precious life.

There was no difficulty in feeding Master Bright-eyes. Apples and nuts, of which he ate hearily all his, the joy of life, but a crust of bread was not despised, and many other things were thankfully accepted. It was a sickening sight to watch him sitting up prim-ly on his haunches with a bit of apple or his nut kernel in his paws, and eating it as daintily as any lady, every now and then pausing to chatter his thanks.

Once he had a very narrow escape from death. It happened in this way. He had climbed into a drawer of the sideboard, and when I went after him he was fast asleep, curled up in the back. Unfortunately there was not room even for his small body beside the top of the drawer and the casing, and in pulling out the drawer the breath was completely squeezed out of the poor little chap. He was quite insensible when I took him out, and for the best, I laid him on his back in the sun, to recover my breath, and gently stroked his breast. Soon he began to revive, and in a few minutes delighted me by being as lively as ever. The next time, alas! he did not fare so well. None of us knew just how it occurred, but one cold morning in late autumn our darling little Bright-eyes was found dead, beyond all hope of reviving, in the bed which my youngest brother and myself shared. He had been let out of his cage when we went to bed, and no doubt some time during the night had crept under the bed clothes and way, climbed on to our bed, crept in between us, where he knew right well it would be deliciously warm, and then in some thoughtless movement made by one of us in the little life had been crushed out without our even knowing of the calamity.—Harper's Young People.

The Old Man Was There.

It was dark in the depot when the evening train came in. An elderly farmer was backed up against the partition, watching for a passenger under the big puffing engine and the yellow cars as they discharged their passengers, when a handsome young lady came up to him, scanning his face over the place, leaving his autograph on everything he touched, that I was compelled to banish him from the room. He generally had the run of the sitting-room during the evening, and yet in his cage before we went to bed. He very decidedly disliked being shut up, and would often hide just before the time came, so that it would be quite a job to hunt him out. As a rule he was found, but several times he succeeded in eluding our search, and so sure as he did, about an hour after all were in bed and the house wrapped in silence, Bright eyes' little feet would be heard pit-pattering over the hall oilcloth, up the stairs, and round about the rooms, until somebody took him into bed, where he would snuggle peacefully until morning. Bill Nye's Residence.

If you will excuse me for introducing a personal matter, said Bill Nye in the New York World, I would like to make an explanation at this time which concerns me, of course, more than anybody else, and yet it ought to be made in the interest of general justice, also. I refer to a recent article published in a Western paper and hastily illustrated, in which, considered the magnum opus of the paper, I find the following picture of my residence:

The description which accompanies the cut, among other things, goes on to state as follows: "The structure is a large, massive, and beautiful. It consists of three stories, besides the cellar, and covers a large area on the ground. It contains an elevator, electric bells, steam-heating arrangements, baths, hot and cold, in every chamber, a large library, fire-escapes, etc. The grounds consist of at least five acres, overlooking the river for several miles up and down, with fine boating and private fish-ponds, two acres in extent, containing every known variety of game fish. The grounds are finely laid out in handsome drives and walks, and the finished the establishment will be one of the most complete and beautiful in the Northwest."

No one realizes more fully than I the great power of the press for good or evil. Slightly used, it can generally be made to unmake man, and wrongly used it can be even worse. Hence, I do not like to use this as I do, I want to be placed right before the people, and I want to have a correct illustration or description of my house, for obvious reasons. In the first place, it is larger and more robust in appearance, and, in the second place, it has not the same tout ensemble as my residence. My house is less obtrusive and less arrogant in its demeanor than the illustration, and it has no elevator in it.

My house is not the kind that seems to crave an elevator. An elevator in my house would lose money. There is no popular clamor for one, and if I were to put one in I would have to abolish the dining-room. It would also interfere with the parlor.

I have learned recently that the correspondent who came here to write up this residence of mine came to Chicago from South, and as he could not find me he was at the mercy of strangers. A young man who lives here and who is associated in the day of life practically connected to show the correspondent my new residence, not yet completed. So they went over and examined the new Allen and Wendell Jackson Hospital, which will be completed in June, and which, is, of course, a handsome structure, but quite different from my house in many particulars.

For instance, my residence is of a different school of architecture, being rather in the Semi-Asiatic order, while the foregoing has a tendency toward the Ionic. The hospital belongs to a very recent school, as I may say, while my residence, in its architectural outlaidsh and conception, goes back to the time of Queen Elizabeth, a time when a Gothic hole in the ground was considered the magnum bonum and the acme of all that is art. If the reader will go around behind the illustration and notice it carefully on the east side, he will not discover a pump discharging into the rear breadths of the wood-shed. That alone ought to convince the correspondent that the house is not mine. The ecensiin of the shed is very far from being correct on my arms, together with a blue goddess of liberty and my name in green India ink.

Above I give a rough sketch of my house. Of course, I have idealized it somewhat, but only in order to please the eye of the public, and I have left out, for the sake, of the house runs back to the time of Polk and Dallas, the wing in which Bright-eyes used to hang out his cage, and which I now show in the drawing, runs back as far as the eastern.

In closing, let me say that I am not finding fault with my new residence, and the error has crept into the public prints, for it is really a magnificent mansion, after all. Neither do I wish to be considered as striving to assume any name from the columns of the press, for no one could be more pickled than I am over a friendly notice of my arrival in town or a kindly reference to my courteous bearing and youthful appearance. I want to see the Oliver Wendell Holmes Hospital succeed, and so I commend it in this way over my own signature and admit that the building does not belong to me, and that, so far as I can remember, the man who flies a lien on it will simply fritter away his time.

Artesian Wells in Tunis.

Southern Tunis is being transformed by Capt. Landais, who is continuing the operations of the family of his father for an inland sea. The artesian wells have been sunk by the French, in a place where 4500 in ready cash constitutes a very rich man.

"He was always extremely impulsive of my few belongings, and his curiosity was insatiable, and he was very rather in manner. On one of his visits he found my bottle of spirits of ammonia on the table, and seeing it was something new and not hitherto inspected, he naturally had hold of it and asked for a dose.

"Only a medicine," I replied, and with much satisfaction watched him hold it up to the light, look at it all sides, and then, as I knew he would, remove the glass stopper, and then take a sniff.

"I had to rush forward to save my precious ammonia, as he staggered and gasped for breath, by dint of most slapping of his back and dousing of cold water he quickly recovered, but never more did he touch my things."—Youth's Companion.

THE defense of Thermopylæ, which has made immortal the name of Leonidas, and his associates, took place in August, 480 B. C.

THE JOURNAL

BY CHAS. J. STRANG.

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

THE first colored man ever elected Mayor of a town north of the Ohio River is Isaiah Toppins, of Reedville, Ohio.

THE wife of a member of Congress objects to being introduced at social gatherings as Mrs. Representative Smith. But it is very common in Washington to hear such introductions in company with "Mrs. Senator A——," "Mrs. Secretary B——," and "Mrs. Judge C——."

THE British Government has refused to allow the Atlanta (Ga.) militia company to enter its domain armed with rifles. This certainly seems inconsistent. American quack doctors are allowed to land upon its soil, and good-looking Englishmen are allowed to carry pistols in peace. Perhaps the real reason is that England is not quite certain of the loyalty of the Atlanta militia company is a babe in arms compared to those chaps.

THE Emperor of Japan has been making a tour of the chief cities of his kingdom. At Osaka the authorities presented him with a handsomely engrossed copy of the census of the inhabitants of the city, one of its interesting features being that out of 31,000 people 715 were over 80 years of age.

WRITING to the Leeds Mercury, a London correspondent says: "I wonder if my readers have noticed how much lighter in color eating or refreshment are changing and how comparatively seldom people take a glass of wine, or a bottle of wine, to London, and turning little milk bars are springing up with mushroom-like rapidity, and they are crowded with the better class of young men."

AMONG the baptismal names found in the list of the Fiftieth Congress are John, Hilary, Adoniram, Knute, Cherubusco, Beriah, and Willy. In surnames the trades are well represented. There is a Baker, a Fisher, a Weaver, a Cooper, a Mason, a Glover, a Hunter, a Miller, a Brewer, a Granger, a Taylor, a Turner, and a Sawyer. For the first time in years there is no Robinson in Congress. The colors represented are White, Gray, and Brown. There is only one Hogg among the members.

GEN. SPINNER says that the first woman employed in the Treasury Department at Washington was Jeannette L. Douglass. Miss Douglass was born in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and was a neighbor of the philanthropist, Gerrit Smith, and it was through his influence that Gen. Spinner made her acquaintance. Miss Douglass was, in 1860, a teacher in Mrs. Smith's female seminary in Washington, in the building occupied by Jefferson Davis while he was Secretary of War. She mysteriously disappeared in New York in 1870, and has never since been heard from.

THE St. James Gazette tells that a horse trotting through Leipzig attracted Berlin, the other day, by some of his hind shoes, the speed at which he was going communicating sufficient impetus to it to send it crashing through a third window and into the street. At some little distance inside the pane stood a statue of the Emperor, which had been placed there on the occasion of his birthday. The shoe fell exactly at the foot of the statue. The lucky owner, as he regard it, is said to have impressed the spectators with his generosity, though of course in a different way, as the eclipse of the sun which preceded Cæsar's death did the Romans.

DR. D. W. MCLAUGHLIN, physician at the Philadelphia Hospital, who was the first to make experiments in this country in the new treatment of consumption, writing a letter to a physician, says: "I have experienced the most gratifying results from the treatment, which I have been employing for some time at the Philadelphia Hospital. Every patient, and we have had some of the most advanced stages of the disease, has improved in a marvelous manner. The gas is administered twice a day, and the improvement, thus arresting the progress of the disease. There is no possible danger from this plan of treatment."—Seminal Chicago physicians, says the Tribune, are trying the same French remedy, and the public is waiting for the results of their experiments in dealing with the monster consumption.

THE New York Legislature is starting in to follow the example of Pennsylvania in waging a warfare against the English sparrow, says the Buffalo Herald. In spite of all that has been said as to the destruction of this little bird that we invited over from England a few years ago to adorn our public parks, and to be a source of pleasure to the public, we do not see any diminution in the blessings which our people enjoy. We have bigger crops of fruit and better, and of everything that is good, than we had before, and seem to sustain the infliction remarkably well. We do not believe the sparrow is half as bad as he is painted, even if he be English. He is a very cheerful and energetic little bird, entirely self-reliant, and seems to have lots of pluck. Pluck about him. If he were suddenly to take his departure, we imagine that we would miss him very much.

LEONARD SWETT gave a noteworthy war talk in Chicago the other night. As is learned from the Chicago Tribune, Mr. Swett had not been long in Washington before he found out from President Lincoln himself why the first call was limited to 75,000. The Government could not utilize more. In his characteristic way Lincoln said to him: "Swett, if your regiment were to wait and take an honest turn, the world has not yet grown on the sheeps' backs to make their uniforms." Mr. Swett said to Mr. Sneed: "Why did you in the beginning talk of peace in ninety days? Didn't you know we wouldn't have peace? To which Sneed replied: "Yes, but it wouldn't do to say it, because of the fear of foreign intervention. We had better wait on this section three months, and then invent something else for the next three months."

AN ingenious dime museum proprietor in Philadelphia has organized an exhibition that abounds in novelty of the first order. He calls it a "Congress of Cranks." Freaks having had their day, he has collected a lot of harmless cranks—poetic, dramatic, legal, religious, political and medical—who are allowed to exhibit their idiosyncrasies before the public. They draw well, and their queer speeches and actions are sure to bring a roar of laughter from the audience, which does not embarrass them in the least, although they do not in a dual sense, as the doctor thinks that he is Shakspeare's superior, recites an original poem. An inventor shows an arrangement by which all the letters in the street boxes throughout the city could be made to leave the boxes and fly through the air to the postoffice, where they could be distributed by looking an electric button; and another inventor explains how he intends to revolutionize the system of travel throughout the world by having men, women, and children through tubes by means of condensed air. There are cranks enough in almost any city to stock a museum.

MISS JANE E. HALL of Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, and a married sister living in Philadelphia, have instituted a suit to recover $4,000,000 from the United States Government, as the heirs at law of the lineal descendants of one Jacob de Haven, a wealthy Frenchman who emigrated to America and settled near Norristown in anteredolutionary times. The story goes that in 1777 De Haven loaned the Colonial Government 500,000 francs with which to carry on the war, and during the latter years of the struggle contributed further of money, food, and forage. During Washington's first administration De Haven presented his claims to Congress, and they were allowed, but as there was not any surplus in those days the claimant was told he must wait for his money. He died before he received a penny, and for more than half a century the claim lay dormant. Between 1860 and 1870 it is said the official records in Washington were examined and a sum was appropriated to pay the heirs of De Haven, but the claimants, each insisting on priority, were so many and the testimony as to descent from De Haven so poor that no money could be made and the civil war put a stop to further proceedings in the matter. Now, however, Miss Hall and her sister think that they have proved conclusively that they are De Haven's true heirs, and they have placed their claim in the hands of a Norristown lawyer, with instructions to bring suit against the Government at once.

Buying Birds in Mexico.

Every here and there in the City of Mexico may be seen a man standing on the curbstone holding out his finger, on which perches a dainty bird, with ever an attempt to spread its wings and fly away, although its little, beady, bright eyes are full of terror at the roar of the street. Is the little creature drugged? No; it is too alert and bright of gaze for that. What, then, is the secret of its amenoses? It is in the condition to the jumping frog of Calaveras. Its wings are clipped, the precaution to fill up its gullet with shot before sallying forth to find an unpeopled place, has in spirit they wish well to those who are.

Gorton, near Cambridge, is the most intense of English villages. Its inhabitants are Quakers, of the extreme style, but it stands second to this English school for extreme conservatism, physical culture and college sports.

Gloton girls wear gowns and pancake hats. Vassar girls want to, but their parents, who live in the country, object to the fashion.

Such a smile influences all around, peep out like sky sunshine after a long rain. Its influence is felt in an wide circle, fearfully. Is is better than one's own conscience.

What a delightful thing it would be if we could always command such an expression at will. Then, when through some misfortune we put on the spectacles with harmonious spheres seem sadly jaundiced, and the world wags off-hand, with a jerk, jerkey-quicker.

What a delightful thing it would be if we could always command such an expression at will. Then, when through some misfortune we put on the spectacles with harmonious spheres seem sadly jaundiced, and the world wags off-hand, with a jerk, jerkey-quicker.

Life seems a little less monotonous since we learned this. Think of the delicate touches, the properly modulated puffs and to mention the delightful evidences of repressed resources. A girl who is able to do all this, and all the world let herself loose, be capable of filling and regulating a jaldon Balloon for the Queen's amusement.

American girls should not allow their cousins to blow them over in this fashion, but should come up with some new and awfully larky innovation.

Summer Fashions.

The summer dress-goods are more than usually handsome and varied this year, and it of course follows that the modes are also of the greatest beauty and diversity.

Perhaps the most popular among the fabrics for wear during the warm months are the finer grades of woolen materials, such as challoids clotns, these popular favorites, the colored armures, canoel's hairs, etc.

The ever-present cashmere will figure extensively in street and house toilets, and the silk-and-wool challoids will be especially in use, especially for misses' dresses. Striped cotton in checked checkets are very much liked.

For seaside toilets, lawn tennis, and yachting costumes, plain and striped summer serges will be used extensively, but lighter and perhaps more graceful dresses are already shown in satinettes, tamises, summer cloths, foulards, and French satines. Etamines are shown in the most pleasing of the summer fabrics, and by many young ladies as prominent features in their coming outfits.

Altogether, from the present outlook, it seems to be the overdress of less difficulty in selecting her summer outfit.

Gloves are quite a study, and a good kid gloves, for wear in the evening, which have been in single glass at a cost of from a dollar contact in Moscow, worked her way as a cabinet to Varna. Ever there on the road as her "boots," stayed some time, and, when she had money enough to buy a suit of clothes suitable to her say, took service as a governess in a family to start for England. When there, she was engaged as a nursery governess in the family, and was taken to the country-seat of some counties of her own birth in the English peerage. But the idea was a idea who she was. As soon as she had saved a small sum she came to Paris, and, before she could find a lodging, she used to pass the night in a cafe, or asylum. Being a person of first-rate education, she found no difficulty in getting the situation of a dumpy in the best, although they in the end, and ends by the time. The writer does not think these statements are supposed to be taken literally, but it is quite true that the spirit they wish well to those who are.

Higher Education of Women.

The unfortunate girls of Russia have again met with an absolute repulse in their efforts to secure a higher course of university studies. The Czar has issued an edict closing all schools for the higher education of the doors of learning have practically been shut in the faces of the girls.

This potentate, overshadowed by historical and traditional ideas, has been the last of the skirt, so that one can hardly imagine the Czar of Russia in the majesty of his ministrations to the lower orders. The lobbier is very short and very much worn, and very much shrunk. To describe the basque is unnecessary, as it is quite as a fashion plate is only peculiarity is the way in which the bodice fits in the shape of a coat, and so that the side basques (for it is cut into three) are allowed to fit upon the sides of the fourmure.

The Dollar Mark.

The origin of the dollar mark came about in this way: Austria, Germany, Spain, Mexico, Mexico, and the rest of the South American states, have each in this country circulated the Spanish dollar dates back about three hundred years. The mill of Spanish money the rail is of three values. The first is one-eighth of a dollar, and is always quoted in Spanish money as "ocho reales." the second is one-tenth of a dollar, and the third (more generally used in Spain than elsewhere) is a dollar. The Spanish-Mexican dollar dates back about one hundred and fifty years. The Spanish dollar bears on the obverse the shield of Spain and the figure 8, denoting eight reals. The Spanish-American dollar has the shield between the pillars of Hercules, figure 8 on it. The Spanish dollar is of less weight and value than the Spanish-Mexican piece of the same denomination, and hence less desirable in a technical sense. The coins to be delivered are guished as "pillar" dollars in trade, and merchants were carried "ocho reales" which coin they would accept in their dealings. The Spanish-Mexican dollar was known to English-speaking people as the "piece of eight" (eight reals) when, prior to the American Revolution, Florida was a Spanish province, maintaining commercial relations with the Spanish dependencies of Mexico and Cuba, accounts were kept in "dollars" and reals, the latter being "eight" and "eighths." In writing, it followed that a distinguishing mark of the character 8 came to be used, implying a piece of eight, the upright stroke of the figure 8 signifying that the pillar was the only coin in question. In customary reckonings, dues and accounts the two perpendicular marks eventually were run through and joined, and the dollar sign in this way has the origin and meaning of the mark.

DAUGHTERS OF EVE.

Matters Grave and Gay in Which Our Fair Readers Take an Special Interest.

A Couple of Columns Prepared Solely for Their Instruction and Edification.

Coos, Chuckles, and Cachinnations.

There has arisen in our midst a new school of diagnosis, if we may use the word, who claim to be able to read your character just as correctly from hearing you laugh as others who claim to be able to do so from reading the lines in your hand or feeling the bumps on your head.

It is a most involved science, and is not likely to become fashionable, because it takes too long a time to master its intricacies, but it repays those who are patient enough to do so.

To a laughter-reader each inarticulate sound of the vocal organs in cachinnation is as expressive to his ears as are the chords of the human voice in speech to the ears of the ordinary listener.

But the Russian female mind is progressing very rapidly, and it may be that it cannot get it at home she will go abroad for it. In the meantime, the school of laughing in Paris.

A late letter from that capital tells us he is now in the full possession of the central part of the city, and, dressed in an air of quiet, settled sadness. Many of his patrons are young women, with financial families who have broken away from home and country restraints, and come there under assumed names to study, and to become proficients in the art of romance. One, the daughter of the Governor of a Russian province, sent south by her family, to be out of the way of restless spirits who had fallen in love with her, and, after a cabinet to Varna. Ever there on the road as her "boots," stayed some time, and, when she had money enough to buy a suit of clothes suitable to her say, took service as a nursery governess in the family, and was taken to the country-seat of some counties of her own birth in the English peerage. But the idea was idea who she was. As soon as she had saved a small sum she came to Paris, and, before she could find a lodging, she used to pass the night in a cafe, or asylum. Being a person of first-rate education, she found no difficulty in getting the situation of a dumpy in the best, although they in the end, and ends by the time. The writer does not think these statements are supposed to be taken literally, but it is quite true that the spirit they wish well to those who are.

Employment.

Employment, which Gladstone calls "nature's physician," is so essential to human happiness that indolence is justly considered the mother of misery.

THE HOUSE REPORTER.

How He Edited the Village Maiden's Poem

"Good-day, sir!" exclaimed the voice of a female in a nasal treble as she stood behind the sporting editor's chair. The horse reporter turned his head toward her.

"Do I see the poetical editor?" she inquired, and she shook her pipe-stem muggles and smiled like a Chinese laundryman.

"Well, he is out at present, madame—Miss, sir, if you please," corrected the damsel.

"Ah! Exactly! Thank you, Miss Sir."

"Miss Calamity Lamenter, if you please. My card, sir." And she laid a gilt-edged, scented-tinted, alligator-sealed piece of bristol board on the sporting editor's desk.

He took the bit of paste-board and stuck it in the toe of his boot, which rested on the corner of the desk, and squinted at it through glass at a distance.

"Ah, yes; beg pardon, Miss Calamity. Excuse my pocket, please; I was not expecting a lady visitor this morning, and my vest was quite open. Pray be seated. And he offered her a chair minus its cane seat. She looked doubtfully at it and he hastened to assure her of its reliability.

"Don't be afraid, miss; it will hold. "This not the first time the chair has been visited by calamity."

"Thank you," she returned, with freezing humor, as she seated herself on the edge of the chair. "When will the poetical editor return?"

"He is on his vacation just now. A poem him along by the end of this week. If you don't like to wait, perhaps I will do as well. I attend to that department while he is away. I am very good judge of poetry; I write, occasionally, some humorous sonnets for the funeral column of the Undertaker's Gazette. I'th ok my lines about the Quakers pretty fine:

"For the job of undertaker
How appropriate a calling!
He's the quietest man you ever saw;
As a steady old mourner
He can beat all things in camp;
And never at a corpse was known to jaw.

"There's another verse in the hymn about the corpse sitting back; but I see that kind of a 'pome' don't hit your fancy. I suppose you can write all-wool, yard-wide, and never-fade bolts on Lewison funnels, the web of true love never would wash, love fabricates a-dressing—I mean, love ice dreaming—all one and the same thing, you know—and dash off couplets, quatrains, and triplets on unequited affection——

"Sir! I'd have you know——

"Sot down, Miss Calamity; pray do. Nothing personal in my last remark. I admire you. Look out! Well, I declare! low me to extricate you.

"Sorry to trouble you on my part, I'm sure, not having placed a board across that chair. I'll see to it this very day. What! not going? Yes; I am very sorry, indeed, that you have been hurt in my chair. Call again, Miss Calamity. I have been quite charmed by your visit. Permit me to open the door. O, no thanks needed. Good afternoon.

"Whew! Come here, Sorts; where are you? Has the door-opener left? What are you laughing at? Hallos! Frizzes and curls, ah!

THE JOURNAL

CHAS. J. GRIER, EDITOR.

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

If Mr. Cleveland's intellectual proportions do not warrant the belief that he is a great man, he is equipped with a faculty more valuable than genius, to wit: the gift of seeing things as the great body of his countrymen see them.—Brooklyn Eagle.

THE Mormons of Utah now agree that the territory may be admitted as a state under a constitution prohibiting the practice of polygamy. This is like the liquor dealers agreeing to enforce the prohibitory liquor law. The territory should be kept out of the union as a state until such a provision in the constitution would not be necessary.

President Cleveland in a letter to mayor D. R. Travers, makes known his final determination not to visit St. Louis during the G. A. R. Encampment. He says: "I should not be frank if I failed to confess, while disclaiming all resentment, that I have been hurt by the unworthy and wanton attacks upon me growing out of this matter, and the reckless manner in which my motives have been misrepresented, both publicly and privately, for which, however, the Grand Army of the Republic, as a body, is by no means responsible. The threats of personal violence and harm, in case I under take the trip in question, which scores of misguided, unbalanced men, under the stimulation of excited feeling, have made, are not unconsidered. Rather than abandon my visit to the west, and disappoint your citizens, I might, if I were alone concerned, submit to the insult to which it is quite openly asserted I would be helplessly subjected, if present at the encampment; but I should bear with me there the people's highest office, the dignity of which I must protect."

One of the Infants.

One of the taxes which the republican organ says should be raised for the purpose of cutting down revenue by prohibiting importations is the tariff upon glass.

The duty upon window-glass now ranges from 61 to 147 per cent, and the average for last year was 86.13 per cent. At this rate, which would seem to be high enough to discourage importation very effectually, the consumers of common window glass paid last year in tariff taxes $1,174,000. The "infant industry" which this duty is supposed to protect employed in 1880 "3,735 men, one woman and 134 children." The average wages of glass-workers in 1860, according to Col. Carrol D. Wright, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of Labor in Massachusetts, was $2.96 per day. In 1880, after twenty years of high duties, the average wages was only $1.79—a decrease of 70 per cent.

Who is "protected" by a duty which compels the people of this country to pay annually $5,000,000 more for the daylight in their houses than they otherwise would? Not the glass-workers, surely. Their wages have diminished. An answer is furnished in the suggestive fact that Mr. DePauw, the great glass manufacturer of Indiana, recently died leaving an estate worth $15,000,000. —World.

Your Best Friend.

Who weeps when you are sad, and laughs with you when you are glad, and smiles at you when you are mad? The Editor. Who has to be both kind and wise, and new—well hardly ever, lies, and when he does excites surprise? The Editor. Who owns a heart as well as cheek, possessed of spirit proud, yet meek and lives on forty cents a week? The Editor.—Selected.

Half of the bullet which killed Lord Nelson is now in the possession of Capt. John H. Burton, of Hamden, Conn. He tells the story thus: John Hepburn, grandnephew of Capt. Burton, and after whom he was named, was sailing master of Victory, Nelson's flagship. After Nelson was wounded he was removed to the cockpit of his vessel, and the surgeon, after extracting the bullet, cut it into two pieces, and gave one to Capt. Hardy, of the Victory, and the other to Sailing-Master Hepburn. The latter gentleman served in a similar capacity on a number of vessels, and once, while on the Turkish coast, he had a native artist of Turkey construct an ivory case in which it has been safely kept ever since. Mr. Hepburn was afterward placed in charge of the Portsmouth dock-yard in England. He lived to an advanced age and finally died universally regretted.

Of the 1,426 persons treated by M. Pasteur for fang wounds but four have died.

The Mexican Muchacha.

Whatever her age, the muchacha is but a grown-up child, fully developed physically at the age of ten, always simple, picturesque, and contented. Her name is probably Dolores, Refugio, Guadalupe, or Antonia. Though she never saw a bonnet in her life and would not know it from a fish-net if you should give her one, her face is never freckled, and her nut-brown skin is as soft as velvet, never having been roughened by soap, powder or cosmetics. Her hands and feet are very small, though never manacled by gloves, shoes or stockings, her limbs are invariably well-rounded, and her bust is superb. Her jetty hair, tied at the ends by a bit of bright-hued ribbon, hangs behind her bare brown shoulders in two long braids. It is not banged over the eyes like a poodle's, nor crimped like an Ethiopian's, but parted straight through the middle, is glossy as a raven's wing and black as the famous alzalostche of her native hills. The freaks of fickle fashion make no change in her attire, which is always the same—nothing on earth but one short skirt and a loose chemise, the latter generally embroidered about the shoulders, leaving her symmetrical arms entirely naked, and, in fact, most of her person to the waist. She is entirely unconscious of a want of further clothing, and the utmost "smarting up" she ever indulges is to add a string of red beads to her neck, a brass bracelet or two to her arms, and to hang a pair of enormous silver hoops in her ears. For church wear and such festive occasions as a ball, fight or function del gallo, she has a blue or black cotton rebozo—a sort of long shawl—which with one careless toss she winds tightly over her head and shoulders.

The muchacha is always the same, whether she be the child of a peon, or of a house-servant, or even the heiress of a small farmer—a product peculiar to rural Mexico; attractive in youth, an old woman at thirty, yet unsophisticated as a baby if she live to the age of eighty. She is governed by the tropical instincts of a passionate race, rather than by the trammels of education—coquettish by nature, yet as innocent of premeditated grossness as was Eve before the fashion of fig-leaves.—Cor. Philadelphia Record.

Longfellow and His Publisher.

A correspondent of The Critic, who says that in 1840 he was editor of a monthly magazine published in New York, to which Longfellow had agreed to furnish occasional short poems at the rate of $14 each, thus tells the story of how "Excelsior" thus furnished, impressed the publisher: "One morning, as I entered the office in William street, the publisher hailed me from his desk near the door, with: 'L-l-look here, H——; s-s-see what a confounded piece of nonsense Longfellow has sent me! Je-je-just listen to this.' Then he proceeded to read the first stanza of the poem, his indignation and his off-recurring stutter uniting in a display of elocution the like of which, we may safely presume, the lyric has never since been the subject of. But it was on the word 'Excelsior,' of the meaning of which he had not the slightest conception, that he invested the full volume of his wrath. Pronouncing it 'Ex-shel-sho!' he utterly lost all his expression of withering contempt. 'There, he said (I omit the stuttering), 'did you ever hear anything equal to that? Now, just listen to another verse!' Then he read the second stanza as he had done the first, and, passionately folding the manuscript, said: 'I wonder if Longfellow thinks he can gouge $14 out of me for such a piece of infernal trash as this? I'm not such a fool, I can tell him, and I'll send it back and give him a piece of my mind.'"

The Musical Gifts of Animals.

Animals of the same species vary in their musical gift, as they do in other points. Some animals are very fond of music and greatly affected by it, while others are insensible or quite averse to it; of the former the hero has already in remote antiquity been mentioned for its joy at the sound of the trumpet, as we read in the book of Job (xxxix, 25). Shakspeare also says in his "Merchant of Venice":

"For do but note a wild and wanton herd,
Or race of youthful and unhandled colts,
Fetching mad bounds, bellowing, and neighing,
Which is the hot condition of their blood,
If they but hear perchance a trumpet sound,
Or any air of music touch their ears,
You shall perceive them make a mutual stand,
Their savage eyes turned to a modest gaze,
By the sweet power of music."

A touching proof of this old truth was given in the late Franco-German War, when, in the evening after the battle of Gravelotte, on the trumpet-signal for the roll-call of the Life-Guards, more than three hundred riderless horses, some of them wounded and hobbling on three legs, answered the well-known sounds and mustered with the remnant of their regiment.

Of the nightingale it is said that in spring the males perch on a tree opposite the hens and sing their best one after another; whereupon the hens select their mates and fly off with them.—F. Weber, in Popular Science Monthly.

The New Orleans Southwestern Christian Advocate, a newspaper for negroes, says that according to its observation the great mass of white persons, when talking with each other, say "negro" (the low-bred say nigger), but when speaking to negroes they say "colored people," which is the same as to say: "You are negroes, but I cater to your foolish pride in saying colored." "We can stand and prefer," says the Advocate, "to be called negroes all the time, for the simple reason we are negroes."

The English style of penmanship has been laid aside by the fashionable women of New York who are learning the small Italian style practiced by their grandmothers.

Beautiful, but ugly named, Hog island, in Grand Traverse bay, was originally the home of Main-a-bo-zhoo, the god of the Chippewa Indians, and a live Chippewa has a deal of hesitancy about fooling around the island, which would lay claim to the spot, if he should be picked up a rock and hit the fish a few blows on the head, stunning it, and even then it took all his strength to get it to the shore. When he examined his capture he found it was a sturgeon, which measured eight feet nine inches in length, and was proportionately large around. It has not been weighed, but those who saw it estimated its weight at nearly two hundred pounds. Its skin is to be preserved. This is probably the largest fish ever captured so far up the Sacramento. Chico (Cal.) Chronicle.

For Winter Evenings.

The evenings are lengthening with the coming of cold weather, says a writer in the Toledo Blade, and we beg to remind the young people—and the older ones too—that a good book, a nice book, and a quiet room are most precious things when taken in combination. Society is good in its way, but one gets talked out, and needs to refresh the mind. We recall the following concerning the habit of reading from a letter written by Lord Macaulay to his niece. It is worth pensing and obeying:

"I am always glad to make my little girl happy, and nothing pleases me so much as to see that she likes books. For books are to me what I am she will find that they are better than all the tarts, and cakes, and toys, and plays in the world. If any one would make me the greatest King that ever lived, with palaces and gardens, and fine dinners and wines and coaches, and beautiful clothes, and hundreds of servants, on condition that I would not read books, I would not be a King. I would rather win your mind to the pleasure of reading of books than a King who did not love reading."

A recent visitor to the Mammoth Cave looked up at the sides and the great dome and asked the guide what the large black spots were. For answer he picked up a pebble and with derisy took down a small bat. There were millions of them, all hanging by the feet, heads down, and in a comatose condition. They spend the winter hanging up here, and appear to prefer, as did the signers of the Declaration, "to hang together," rather than "hang separately." Although in a state of coma they know enough when put back in position to "catch on."

A female acquaintance not remarkable for her beauty had just been making a call on the lady of the house. "What do you think of her?" the latter asked Jones, who was present. That polite youth, who prides himself on never being taken at a disadvantage, at once replied: "I have never seen her before, but she must have altered dreadfully."—French Fun.

SCROFULA

Humors, Erysipelas, Canker, and Catarrh, Can be cured by purifying the blood with

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass. Price $1; six bottles, $5.

I do not believe that Ayer's Sarsaparilla has an equal as a remedy for Scrofulous Humors. It is pleasant to take, gives strength and vigor to the body, and produces a more permanent, lasting, result than any medicine I ever used.—E. Haines, No. Lindale, O.

I have used Ayer's Sarsaparilla in my family, for Scrofula, and know, if it is taken faithfully, it will thoroughly eradicate this terrible disease.—W. F. Fowler, M. D., Greenville, Tenn.

For forty years I have suffered with Erysipelas. I have tried all sorts of remedies for my complaint, but found no relief until I commenced using Ayer's Sarsaparilla. After taking ten bottles of this medicine I am completely cured.—Mary C. Auesbury, Rockport, Mo.

I have suffered, for years, from Catarrh, which was so severe that it destroyed my appetite and wrecked my system. After trying other remedies and getting no relief, I began to take Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and, in a few months, was cured.—Simon L. Cook, 900 Albany st., Boston Highlands, Mass.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla is superior to any blood purifier that I have ever tried. I have taken it for Scrofula, Canker, and Salt-Rheum, and received much benefit from it. It is good, also, for a weak stomach.—Millie Jane Pulsifer, South Bradford, Mass.

It is guaranteed to give perfect satisfaction, or money refunded. Price 25 cents per box. For sale by Dr. G. W. Crouter.

Just received an invoice of center tables and rocking chairs which we are selling very cheap, at S. M. See & Sons's.

We are pleased to note the improvements made on Rose street, along the park. This seems to be a judicious expenditure of the road tax.

In another column can be found a notice for bids on clearing and grading the Detroit, Charlevoix, & Escanaba railroad. This is surely encouraging.

E. B. Hodge & Co. have a new advertisement in this paper in which they call attention to their complete stock of harness, at their shop near the bridge.

An adjourned meeting of the directors of the Charlevoix County Agricultural Society will be held at East Jordan, Monday, July 25th. By order of secretary.

The tug Welcome from Milwaukee came Tuesday, and the same night left with the hull of the Champlain for the Milwaukee dry dock where it will be rebuilt.

The steamer Thomas Friant will give her big annual Sunday excursion from Charlevoix to Petoskey, to attend the camp meeting. The popularity of this boat will insure her a large crowd.

The Charlevoix base ball team will lock horns with the Evart team at Charlevoix tomorrow, commencing at 2.30 p. m., and a very exciting game is expected, as the Evart club stand high in the arts of the national game.

Chas. S. Hampton's Daily Resorter will resume publication, for the season of 1887, this week, printed as heretofore on pink paper, and contain descriptions of all the northern resorts, and interesting bits of resort news.

The Charlevoix JOURNAL has just completed its fifth year, and is advertising patronage and exhibits every symptom of living to a green old age as one of the representative journals of northern Michigan.—Eaton Rapids Journal.

We understand that there is a strong probability that the D. C. & E. R. R. will be continued to Petoskey and the Straits of Mackinaw. The engineer will go over the line next week, and report upon the feasibility of its construction.

S. M. See & Sons are crowding a very large and handsome stock of furniture into a moderate sized sales room, and how they are going to turn it all into cash is a conundrum. However, we shall keep an eye on them, and perhaps learn something.

Wm. Hanigan, of Atwood, was run over by the cars in Chicago last Friday and instantly killed. Mr. Flanigan had been a resident of this region for seventeen years, and at the time of his decease was in the mercantile business at Atwood. He also dealt largely in wood, lumber, bark, etc., and has made many warm friends. His remains were brought home yesterday.

The Tradesman, of Grand Rapids, publishes the following concerning the druggists' excursion to Charlevoix last week: "At the invitation of the people of Charlevoix, extended by Dr. Crouter, about 200 delegates and ladies boarded the steamer City of Grand Rapids at 2 o'clock for a trip to Charlevoix. The trip was a delightful one in every respect, the weather being all that could be desired, and the reception at Charlevoix cordial beyond expression. Dr. Crouter extended the free use of his soda fountain, cigar case, and boat livery, all of which were liberally patronized. The return trip was made without incident, the boat reaching the Petoskey dock about 7 o'clock."

Another Chicago boat is needed very much. The commerce of northern Michigan has so increased in the past few years that the project of putting another boat on the Northern Michigan line for the season of 1887 was considered seriously, but finally given up. Now the loss of the Champlain from that line, and the City of Traverse from Hannah, Lay & Co.'s line, leaves us with very poor facilities for transportation.

Mr. A. J. Mills general agent for the Van Deusen nursery, of Geneva, N. Y., is canvassing Charlevoix and vicinity in the interest of that company, taking orders for fruit and ornamental trees, and establishing agencies. Mr. Mills has been with the firm seven years, comes well recommended, and we have no doubt his trees are all he represents, and (coming from Geneva, N.Y.) are sufficiently hardy for this climate. He will be here another week, and can be seen at Fountain City house.

Charlevoix is rarely favored with a more pleasureable entertainment than the McGibeny-Davis concert Tuesday evening. These people enjoy an enviable reputation in the art of music, and it suffered not a whit by this evening's work. While every part was highly gratifying, especial mention should be made of Mrs. McGibeny's cornet solo, which held rapt interest in the audience, and was only too brief, also the superb contralto voice of Miss Delia Davis, which evidenced an abundance of natural excellence and a high state of culture.

H. Lee Iddings' new house on the corner of Grant street and the park is about completed, and is a model of convenience and neatness. It has a commodious cellar, six rooms on the lower floor, and four rooms and two closets on the upper floor. A handsome winding stairway connects the two floors, all finished of natural hardwood in tasteful design. From the upper story one has an unobstructed view of Lake Michigan and the village below. Taken altogether Mr. Iddings has one of the most desirable residences in the village.

"The Herald is in receipt of a letter from David Ward, to the effect that if Mancelona will treat him and his interests fairly, he contemplates (after finishing his main line to Alba) the building of a branch to Mancelona, and will form a junction at the state road, on the east line of town 29 north of range 5 west; the line to be about ten miles in length, and to run through Mr. Ward's land about four fifths of the way. 'This line, or branch,' writes Mr. Ward, 'would give Mancelona a competing line for the importing and exporting of her forest products, merchandise and other freights, besides a direct route to the Saginaws and Detroit, saving a distance of from fifty to sixty miles,' and he adds, 'that such a line would seemingly put Mancelona on the top of the commercial world.' We hope David Ward means just what he says, and that Mancelona will get the road, but he has been writing railroad letters to Charlevoix for the last five years, promising to assist in building a railroad that would "put Charlevoix on the top shelf," and we are yet without a road and seemingly will be a long time if we wait for Mr. Ward.

W. H. Chandler, of Milwaukee, is visiting his sister Mrs. W. G. Clark.

H. P. Lemoine arrived this week and now occupies Breezy Point cottage.

Harry Sutton, of Minneapolis, Kan., is down visiting his sister, Mrs. Hattie Carr.

O. C. Ainsworth of Sandwich Ill., returned last Saturday with his family to their cottage for the summer.

Miss M. L. Jones, principal of the Charlotte public school, spent Sunday with the family of Rev. W. G. Clark.

Miss Maggie Enos, of Charlevoix, arrived Monday evening and is visiting Miss Erran Bishop, on Harris street this week.—Cadillac News and Express.

"Capt." Taylor who has been sailing on the tug Stone between Cleveland and Green Bay, is spending a few days at home.

C. W. Alling, traveling salesman for Callaghan & Co., lawbook publishers, of Chicago, is spending a few days about Charlevoix in search of health and pleasure.

E. A. Stowe, of the Michigan Tradesman, Grand Rapids, and Frank Hamilton, of Traverse City, made the JOURNAL a pleasant call one day last week.

R. F. Stuart, postoffice inspector, examined into the affairs of the Charlevoix postoffice last Thursday. His tour of inspection includes all the money order postoffices of northern Michigan.

F. W. Hathaway, of the Redpath Lyceum Bureau, Chicago, arrived last week for his regular annual visit among the trout and bass streams of this vicinity. Fred has the faculty of putting in a good many hours of pleasure each day, without neglecting the business of the bureau. He has just started another concert company on a tour through the northwestern states and territories, and can take care of all who want engagements.

P. D. Phillips, of Charlevoix, delivered a lecture in the K. of L. hall on Tuesday evening. The subject of the lecture was the labor question. A fair audience was present, and listened to the remarks of the lecturer with attention. Mr. Phillips is well informed on the principal labor topics of the day having devoted considerable time to their study, and apparently understands the grievances of the workingmen throughout the country, as well as the remedy required for their removal.—Sault Ste. Marie Democrat.

Coming Events.

There will be preaching at the Congregational church Sunday morning.

Tucker and Brown's great Metropolitan Theater at opera hall next Tuesday evening, Hazel Kirke and a roaring farce.

Remember the lecture by J. S. Smithson Wednesday evening, July 27th, descriptive of Egypt and the Orient.

Preaching at Ironton M. E. church next Sunday morning and evening by the pastor. Special subjects are announced.

Rev. W. H. McCartney will preach in the Congregational church at Ironton, at 3 o'clock on Sunday afternoon July 24. This is a rare opportunity to hear an earnest christian worker.

The Ladies Guild of Christ Church mission, will serve ice cream and cake with iced tea in the Sentinel building on Friday afternoon and evening. They hope to please all who come.

The children of the Loyal Legion will have a picnic in Mr. Inwood's grove next Saturday afternoon. Ex-ses at 3 o'clock, supper at 5 o'clock. The children are requested to bring lunch baskets.

Evening prayer and bible study at opera hall at 3 p. m. on Sunday. Subject, "God's law of growth in the natural and spiritual kingdom." See St. Mark 4-26. Sunday school re-organized. Let everyone interested in this mission and school bring full sheaves.

Baptist services next Sunday morning at 10:30, preaching by Dr. Haskell, followed by Sunday school immediately. The Thursday evening prayer meetings at the Baptist hall will be omitted on account of the union bible reading at the Congregational church.

All are invited to attend the following services at the Congregational church: Bible reading this Thursday and Friday at 7.30 p. m.; Sunday evening gospel meeting at opera hall at 7.30. Next week bible reading at the M. E. church as follows: Tuesday, 7:30; Wednesday, 4 p. m. These services are led by H. F. Sayles. Bring your bibles.

What Does He Mean!

The state editor of the Evening News gets off the following:

Petoskey has the Methodists and is doing well, Harbor Springs stays by the orthodox Presbyterians and is not slow as a summer resort, but Charlevoix comes out with an attraction that will down even the Methodists, that can drive a Presbyterian up a tree every day in the week and that has the eminent ability to make the Baptist get out of the water. Charlevoix has sea lions. Their bowls can be heard in the harbor any night and one man says he has seen them. He doesn't remember much about it though as he came away right off. What brought them there is a mystery but their presence is a source of gratification to the people of Charlevoix.

In Brief, and to the Point.

Dyspepsia is dreadful. Disordered liver is misery. Indigestion is a foe to good cheer. The human digestive apparatus is one of the most complicated and wonderful things in existence. It's easily out of order.

Greasy food, tough food, sloppy food, bad cookery, a hasty worry, late hours, irregular habits, and many other things which ought not to be, have made the American people a nation of dyspeptics.

But Green's August Flower has done a wonderful work in reforming this sad business and making the American people so healthy that they can enjoy their meals and be happy.

Remember—No happiness without health. But Green's August Flower brings both health and happiness to the dyspeptic. Ask your druggist for a bottle. Seventy-five cents.

An End to Bone Scraping.

Edward Shepherd, of Harrisburg, Ill., says: "Having received so much benefit from Electric Bitters, I feel it my duty to let suffering humanity know it. Have had a running sore on my leg for eight years; my doctors tell me I must have the bone scraped or leg amputated. I used, instead, three bottles of Electric Bitters and seven boxes Bucklen's Arnica Salve, and my leg is now sound and well." Electric Bitters is sold at 50 cts. a bottle, and Bucklen's Arnica Salve at 25c. per box by Dr. G. W. Crouter. 5

THE OLD APPLE TREE.

BY E. F. L.

The golden sun was sinking within the far-off west,
As 'neath the apple tree in the yard my grandpa sat at rest;
The dew was gently falling, the birds had ceased their lays,
And nature everywhere sent forth the tender shoots of spring.

'Neath the apple tree, on a rustic, set grandpa and his wife;
This is old," said I. "Some one has come into the room by mistake, doubtless, and he knows I was here." I speaked.
The young lady did not hear me. I spoke: "Madam," said I, "I presume you are not aware—in fact, that I am here."

Then the figure arose. It turned toward me, but again I could not see its face. Its back was to the moon. The outlines, strangely familiar, was all I could discern. The white robe that looked like a shroud trailed after the long hair that flowed over it.

I said to myself very calmly, "Were I a superstitious person I should consider this a ghost."

And still it came nearer, nearer. It was very quiet-pressing.

"Madam," I said again, more loudly, "I presume you are aware that I am here?" And a voice answered me—a voice I seemed to have heard before:

"Yes, I am aware of it. I came because I knew it—I came because I knew it!"

Then she began to moon again. She stood beside the bed now, only a few inches from me. She stretched out her cold hands. It was time to do something.

Whoever she was, I saw that she was dangerous. A maniac, perhaps. I put my hand under my pillow, where my pistol lay, I seized it.

"Whoever you are," said I, "I presume you are a thief, playing at ghost. Leave the room, I give the—seconds to do it in. I count them; at the third count I fire. One—two—three."

As I said one—she retreated, pointing at me. As I counted two she drew still further off. As I cried three she was gone! I lit that lonesome lamp and examined the room. The door was shut and locked on the inside; the windows fastened down with nails, as all windows are in rural houses. I looked behind the boxes and barrels and chairs. I did the floor; there was no trap-door. Yet she was gone.

If I have a failing I am superstitious. I should have said that I had seen a spirit. As it was, being a practical man, I sat once argued with myself. Tough fried ham and—coffee—I called "hajon puddin," whatever it may have been, had given me a nightmare; a nightmare in an unusual form, however—a fair young girl in white, instead of Othello or a black dog. There were exceptions to everything. I had a white nightmare in place of a black one, that was good.

Again I put out my kerosene lamp. Again I mind myself between the corncobs. Again I slept. Again I woke, to find a figure—the same figure—bending over me. It was meaning still; but this time—it was doing more. Two hands, as cold as ice, were about my throat, pressing hard upon it. I was being choked to death.

"What are you doing?" cried I, catching at my pistol again.

The cold hands dropped away. The figure retreated, vanished, as before. I made a new search, and I argued with myself again. "Nightmares always choke me," said I. "Mine always nightmare only did so to other do." But this time, though I tried myself in among the corn-cobs again, I found it harder to sleep, and though I slept I dreamed. I was being choked to death by a hand at my throat, and a voice meaning to say—"Let me rest in my grave. I do not want to kill him. Let me rest."

My pistol cure proved three white figures away. But a nightmare was a more serious thing than I had imagined. Had I ever been fool enough to drink too much? Should have fancied myself the victim of delirium tremens—just a shade! Didn't I give no admittance to that thought for a moment. It was the same figure, the falling hair, the touch of the little hands, cold as icy rays, pressed me of some one I had known long ago—that was part of my nightmare—that was the meaning. I said, "will I partake of that awful dish, 'injun pudding,' with a nightmare. Never!"

I set up after that and saw the sun rise for the first time in my existence. It was a chilly operation, as uncomfortable as most things are that are considered nonsense; cold baths and a Graham diet, for instance. I've never tried it again. An awful hen footed us down to breakfast, which was principally fat pork. When I came down the back woman of the house, already in visible at the end of a sun-bonnet, was talking to Bradley in the hall. I heard her—but I not on steam.

"Yes, I was aware of it. I came because I knew it—I came because I knew it!"

THE WORLD'S BIGGEST SPONGE.

Description of a Prize Tubber—Mediterranean Sponges—Qualities Found.

"That is the largest Florida sponge in the world," said a William street dealer to a reporter.

The sponge looked like the thatched roof of a small cabin, and measures eight feet in circumference when wet.

"We have one in Philadelphia on temporary exhibition there that is ten feet in circumference. It is from the Mediterranean. This sponge has taken medals in France, Amsterdam, New Orleans and other places. We would not take $500 for it. It holds fifteen gallons of water."

The reporter was then shown the smallest, which is as big as a chestnut, and never grows any larger. It is taken on the reefs and is sold for a slate sponge.

"The Mediterranean sponges," continued the informant, "are taken in the Grecian archipelago, by men in diving suits, who go into much deeper water than they do in Florida. There most of them are taken with grappling irons, in the same way as oysters. They can be seen with the eye at the bottom, clinging to the rocks. When one is dislodged another grows in its place, taking from six months to a year. A great many are also taken in the Bahamas. The market for that crop is Nassau, New Providence. Key West is the market for the Florida sponges, which are taken all along the coast. Trieste and London are the markets for the Mediterranean sponges. Some are taken off the coast of China."

"Are any curiosities found in them?"

"We had one once that inclosed a large pig. It was a fine sponge, and had grown completely around it. They are frequently full of shells. When a sponge is first taken out of the water it is as black as ink, and it has to be treated by various processes until it becomes the color commonly seen. A sponge is the lowest order of animal life, being considered partly animal and partly vegetable. A number of minute animals live in it. The business is about half a century old in this country. Sponges are sold by the bale in this country, and by the case in Europe. They weigh from 25 to 100 pounds. When sold by weight the dealers are allowed to send them about 25 per cent. Prices range from $10 to $150, the latter for very fine toilet sponges. There are many grades, such as silk, velvet, cup, glass, bath, surgeon, slate, etc."

"When is the active season?"

"Spring and fall are the active seasons for selling. For gathering, the latter part of the year—November and December—is the most active, although some fishing is carried on all the year."

—New York Mail and Express.

New York's Network of Wires.

There are about 20,000 miles of telegraph and telephone wires in New York city. Of this number the Western Union Telegraph company operates and controls more than 3,000 miles, 500 miles of which are already placed in conduits underground. The same company operates over 430,000 miles all told. Its wires are already in one continuous line would go around the globe nearly eighteen times, and they would reach from the earth to the moon and almost back again. The 20,000 miles of wire in this city would make over 2,920 parallel lines from the Battery to Harlem river, and over double that number from the East to the North river at the greatest width of Manhattan Island.

This length of wire weighs comparatively little. The wires of the Western Union company vary in weight from 230 to 650 pounds per mile. Taking the smallest sized wire as a basis for calculation, one ton of metal would make fifteen and one-half miles of wire, while 2,000 tons would be sufficient to stretch around the world, with plenty to spare. The cost of the wires is about six cents per pound. They are very durable when stretched through an open country, lasting from twenty-five to thirty years. Atmospheric changes affect them but little. Repairs are chiefly made in towns where chemical substances are used in manufacturing purposes, the smoke from the factory chimneys being very destructive to the metal.

Methods of the Dudes.

The old ele' man could, if he would, tell curious secrets of well dressed humanity. Most of us can recall transactions with this peripatetic trader, in which, after treating with customly each individual piece of a not inelegant wardrobe, he hugged off the garments and left with the seller a pitifully small sum in exchange. The gilded youth does those things better. His old clothes are but technically old, as the young soldier of a few years' service is technically a veteran. He never wears a gilt-edged tenor than a few weeks, and he sells it for a fair percentage of the original cost. He gets long credits from his tailor and cash down from the old ele' man. He thus contrives to be always well dressed at a comparatively moderate cost. It is told of a great ready made clothier's son that the young man appeared in a new suit at least once a month. He wore his garments carefully, and after they had been pressed and cleaned returned them to his father's stock to be sold as new to an unsuspecting public.—New York Letter.

The Sensations of the Dying.

It is doubtless the case that in many instances—and perhaps they are the majority—dying persons have gradually fallen into unconsciousness that ends their bodily pain, and saves them from the anguish of the final parting with those they leave behind. It is not uncommon, however, for dying persons to continue to persist to the last, and perhaps it is still more common for some of the special senses to preserve their activity. We think it was Ernest Wagner who, in his "General Pathology," dwelt particularly on the preservation of the sense of hearing in many cases long after the apparent occurrence of unconsciousness, and we tenderly cautioned his readers that this possibility should be borne in mind.—New York Medical Journal.

Love of the Trivial

One of our human frailties is the appetite with which we devour the trivial. It is a kind of lust for the contemptible and quite as debilitating to the higher and spiritual nature as the sensual is to the moral and physical man.—Signor Max.

MORTGAGE SALE.—Default has been made in the payment of a mortgage executed by Carl G. Van Tuyle to Lyman D. Batchelor, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Charlevoix county, Michigan, on May 19th, 1881, in liber four of mortgages, on page 341, upon which said mortgage there is claimed by Lemuel H. Batchelor to Lewis Seymour and Walter F. Brown, on the 23d day of December, 1883, and said assignment is recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds for Charlevoix county, Michigan, on the 24th day of December, 1883, in liber 10 of mortgages, on page 341, upon which said mortgage there is claimed to be due two hundred and ninety-five dollars, ($295) principal and interest, for the recovery of which no proceedings have been instituted. And whereas the power of sale in said mortgage contained has become operative. Notice is hereby given that in virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage and the statute in such case made and provided, the premises described in said mortgage, at public auction, to the highest bidder, at the front door of the court house in Boyne City, in said county, (that being the place where the circuit court for said county is held) on the 10th day of August, 1887, at 11 o'clock noon of said day, which said premises are described in said mortgage as follows: A part of lot 3 of Carl G. Van Tuyle's (the village of South Boyne) plat, in the village of South Boyne, which is described as follows, viz.: Commencing at the southwest corner of said lot, thence running east along Main street fourteen (22) feet, thence north to the north line of said lot, thence west along the north line of said lot, thence southwest corner of said lot, thence south to the place of beginning.

Dated May 9th, 1887.

ROBERT W. KANE, Mortgagee.

F. W. MANNS, Attorney for Mortgagee. Charlevoix, Michigan.

MORTGAGE SALE.—Default having been made in the payment of a mortgage executed by William Heath and Joseph Hine to Lewis Seymour, dated the 3rd day of April, 1882, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Charlevoix county, Michigan, on the 10th day of May, 1882, in liber seven of mortgages, on page thirty-seven, and said mortgage has been duly sold and assigned to Lewis Seymour, by said assignment dated September 23, 1882, and recorded in the office of the Register of deeds for Charlevoix county, in liber 11 of mortgages, on page 175, on the 8th day of May, 1887, and the same is now owned by the said Henry H. Vanderpoel, and there is claimed to be due upon said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of four hundred and seventy-seven dollars ($477), and no proceedings have been taken to collect the same, and the power of sale therein contained having become operative, therefore, notice is given that the premises described in said mortgage, viz.: Lots one (1) and two (2) of section four in said township and county, will be sold at public auction, at the front door of the court house in the village of Boyne City, in the county of Charlevoix, in the state of Michigan, that being the place where the circuit court in said county, on the 10th day of August, 1887, at 11 o'clock A. M., New Style, of said day, to satisfy said mortgage, viz.: The west half of the south east quarter of section 33, township 33 north, range eight w. of township of Marion, Charlevoix county, Mich., Map 1887.

Dated Charlevoix, Mich., May 9, 1887.

HENRY H. VANDERPOEL, Assignee of Mortgage.

A. D. CRUICKSHANK, Attorney for Assignee, Charlevoix, Michigan.

SHERIFF'S SALE.—Notice is hereby given that by virtue of a writ of fieri facias issued out of the Circuit Court, for the county of Charlevoix, in favor of Pine Lake Iron Company, against the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of the real estate of William S. Holland and Victoria Wolcott, in said county, to me directed and delivered I did on the 19th day of February, A. D. 1887, levy upon, and take all the right, title and interest which said William S. Holland and Victoria Wolcott, in and to the following described real estate, that is to say: The north half quarter of the south west quarter of section eighteen in the township of Eveline, Charlevoix county, state of Michigan, being in township twenty, range 7 west, all of which I shall expose for sale at public auction or vendue, to the highest bidder, at the front door of the Court House in Boyne City, in said county, on the 2d day of August, A. D. 1887, at 10 o'clock A. M. of said day.

Dated the 9th day of June, 1887.

Political Notes and News.

If protection is a wise policy for one country, why is it not wise for all? If restriction of foreign trade is good, why would not its total obstruction be still better.—Boston Herald.

"Protection for coal, but free trade in labor," as one of the miners puts it, has reduced the operatives in Pennsylvania quite to the grade of the "pauper labor of Europe."—New York World.

The down-trodden European immigrant who comes to to the United States under the impression that the boys of Gotham are all dear, honest little angels, gets to learn a few sad truths before he finally settles down.—New York Journal.

President Cleveland's remarks at the Clinton centennial celebration are commended alike by the press of all parties. The sentiment and style were admirable and clever, fresh and attractive. The president has a proper appreciation of the dignity of his office and knows how to express it in clear, dignified and forcible language.

"What is the matter with President Cleveland? We ask this question in all seriousness."—Tribune. We are glad you do—it is all seriousness; and we answer in like seriousness. There is nothing the matter with President Cleveland. The matter is with you. You have a bad attack of partisan jaundice, and it has blurred your vision so that everything you look at has a bilious aspect. President Cleveland is all right, thank you, as right as a trivet—what ever a trivet may be. You will be all right, too, if you take a dose or two out of your eyes and quit looking at everybody with the narrow, distorted vision of the partisan.—Free Press.

Foreign War Vessels.

It is not generally know, but it is a fact, that the Navy Department in Washington keeps thoroughly informed as to the whereabouts of our vessels of all foreign powers. Not only know the minutest details of each man-of-war equipment, such as the number of guns, character and thickness of the armor and number of men carried, but we are up on every point as to speed, age, present position, possible destination, and all that kind of thing. We know about how one is to find out about the war ship of every other nation, but we are especially and peculiarly familiar with all that pertains to the war boats of the Jan Bull."

The information is collected, compiled, tabulated and disseminated by the Bureau of Naval Intelligence. On a little map of the world in the bureau may be seen many little bunches of pins, to each of which is attached a label bearing the name of a foreign ship. It tells at a glance where the ships of the various nations are. These pins are changed daily or weekly in accordance with the movements of the vessels. The Secretary of the Navy can learn at once if weight is to be attached to the movements of a foreign boat.

The President's Letter.

President Cleveland's letter to Mayor Francis of St. Louis, declining the invitation to be present in that city on the occasion of the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, which is published elsewhere in this paper, is one of the pleasantest and most courtly documents that ever came from the pen of a president of the United States.

No comrade of the order unbiased by party or political motives will hesitate to condemn the mischief-makers, outside or inside the organization, whose insults and obnoxious interference forced upon the president the necessity for writing such an epistle.

But there is this about it: The president's dignified course and manly communication has punctured somebody's political balloon, and the accumulated gas of the last two months has turned into vapor.—Boston Grand Army Record.

Remove the Obstacles.

Everybody said when the mouth of the Mississippi was deepened for large ships, and when the rocks of Hell Gate, in New York harbor were blown out to facilitate trade, that great good had been accomplished. The sand in the Mississippi and the rocks in New York harbor hindered commerce. If their removal was a good thing, why should the tariff policy be maintained as a barrier to prevent commerce from freely coming into and going out of every one of our splendid harbors? The tariff obstructs trade. Would it not be as wise to open a channel through these obstructive tariff laws, as was Gen. Newton's removal of the hindrances to commerce from New York harbor, and Capt. Eads from the Mississippi river? And then, what is the use of removing one class of obstructions and at the same time keeping up more formidable ones? The recent convention of ocean subsidy seekers in Chicago seemed to want these tax obstructions preserved, but they also wanted to have their changing effect overcome by levying more taxes and giving the money to ship owners. The plain fact is that our tariff laws are in effect a Chinese wall against trade, and these subsidy seekers ask the people to pay for steam engines to haist trade over it, while common sense affirms that the best way to remove the wall and the beggarly capitalists who desire to embark in commercial enterprises will need no subsidies. It is absurd to claim that until the obstacles to trade are removed, Grand Rapids Democrat.

Destruction of Our Forests.

The agricultural department has issued a report which shows that 10,000,000 acres of forest are used yearly in this country for fuel and lumber. Fires it is calculated, destroy about 10,000,000 acres more. The forest area of the country is less than 450,000,000 acres. At this rate we will in less than a quarter of a century have no forests. Whatever may be the future from a change in the fuel question the demands for timber will increase as the country becomes more populous. The whole thing seems to point to arboriculture on a large scale and systematically, and in no long time either.—Indianapolis News.

It is hard to believe, but it is said to be true, that there is a man living in South Carolina whose name is Harmon Dive-out Jump-under Come-to-Jesus Hallelujah Hugh Hall Hitther-to-me Gideon Hall Hugh Hall Harvey Kizziah Sones. Also that on a tombstone near Winnsboro, Ala., is cut "Henri Ritti Demi Ritter Emmi Ritter Sweet Cream Ice Cream." Carolina Sentwick, infant daughter of Bob and Suckey Catlin." It was the name of a little girl.

The fashionable young society woman of New Haven, Conn., who married a mechanic the other day, has been persuaded by her friends that she ought to know what she was about, and didn't know what she was about when they are trying to have the marriage annulled. It by no means succeed on the ground of the girl's "absence of mind" they might charge the mechanic with having drugged and prove it by showing that he married a fashionable society woman.

Mrs. Helen M. Avery, of the Interior Department, is the only accomplished woman among the 15,000 and more Government clerks. The President is a great admirer of her penmanship, and frequently refers to it in complimentary terms when it comes, as it often does, under his observance. Mrs. Avery is about twenty-eight years old. She does her work rapidly and apparently without effort. Her clerkship pays about two hours a day, and her salary is $1,600 per annum.

Mr. Godey, who died leaving a fortune of two or three millions, made chiefly out of his "Lady's Book," when asked why he did not raise the standard of his magazine said: "I am making a magazine for the fool, but a magazine for the Elius James. They are in a vast majority."

N. O. Shelnutt, of Jackson county, Georgia, who had been twice hanged and rescued, and who ought to know about it, says it is a great mistake to think that death by hanging is painful. "There is no pain about it," he says, "and a man can die fully easy."

THE ASSASSIN'S KNIFE.

Joseph C. Kennedy, a Prominent Citizen of Washington, Stabbed to Death.

THE most sensational murder in Washington since the assassination of President Garfield was committed on Wednesday evening, says a dispatch from that city. Opposite the northeastern end of the Treasury Department Building, Joseph C. Kennedy, an affluent real estate agent, one of the oldest residents of Washington, and a personal acquaintance of many of the most prominent people in the national capital, was murdered in cold blood, apparently without provocation, by John Daily, a white laborer. Kennedy left his office and started to take a car, when Daily, who had been loitering around the corner several hours, walked up behind him and drawing a large keen-bladed knife, similar to those used by butchers in killing hogs, ran it into Kennedy's right side near the abdomen with a vicious lunge, and then gave it a jerk sidewise. There was a large crowd on the corner at the time, but all were so horror-stricken for a moment that nobody moved. Kennedy fell to the ground after giving a cry of "murder," gleaned dizzily, and pointed to the murderer, who made no attempt to escape. The knife dropped out of Kennedy's side as a physician came up. Mason, a colored watchman, seized Daily, who stood looking on, apparently the most unconcerned and self-possessed man in the crowd. Kennedy expired in five minutes, and his body was removed to a police station. The murderous man was about 75 years old, of an old Maryland family, and one of the most respected citizens of Washington. He was a grandson of Ellicott, who, at the request of President Washington, surveyed the ten miles square incorporated as the District of Columbia. In 1850 and 1860 Mr. Kennedy was Commissioner of the Census. He was a prominent politician in his earlier days, and was a staunch admirer of the old Whig party. At one time he edited the Franklin (Pa.) Repository. He was an intimate friend of ex-Senator Conkling, Attorney General Garland, W. W. Corcoran, and a large number of other people. He announced some that years ago Kennedy wronged his (Daily's) father.

GUATEMALA.

President Barrillas Assumes Full Control of the Country.

PRESIDENT BARRILAS, of Guatemala, has issued a decree assuming full control of the country and suspending the action of the constitution. The Banco International refuses him a loan of $200,000, but, having the law in his power, he will find it quite easy to compel the officials to make the loan. His reason for suspending the constitution was that the Legislature had passed unconstitutional acts. The President has called a convention on constitution.

Educators in Council.

THE National Educational Association at Chicago, at the second day's session, listened to a number of papers upon educational topics. The standing committee were appointed, and a resolution indorsing the Blair bill was offered by a Boston delegate, and referred to the appropriate committee. The attendance at Central Music Hall was so great that overflow sessions were held at the Madison Street Theater, where the proceedings of the principal meeting were duplicated.

The President.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND attended the centennial celebration Wednesday at Clinton, N. Y., held a reception at the residence of Mrs. O. H. Williams, and in the afternoon made a short address in the park, confining his remarks to profitable recollections of Clinton. At the banquet he also responded to the toast, "The President of the United States."

THE EASTERN STATES.

AN explosion occurred in the Cullinate Manufacturing Company's works at Arlington, N. J. A Swede named August and Miss Ariana Mackenzie were instantly killed and about twenty others were seriously injured, none fatally. The works, three brick buildings, were totally destroyed. The loss is $50,000.

A NEW YORK dispatch reports that the sloop Mystery, with a party of excursionists on board, was capsized off Barren Island. The tide was tearing out more rapidly than a mill race, and a hard breeze that was almost a gale gave a wild curl to the waves. The sloop had started to come about, but the bigness of her boom—there were thirty-seven persons in her—caused delay. Then a squall struck her. Over she went, and men, women and children were thrown into the water. The scene received the remaining twenty-seven were engulfed by the waters.

AUSTIN COBURN, the well-known railroad magnate, says a New York special, was assaulted and severely injured at Manhattan Beach by a reporter for a New York evening paper, who struck him with a heavy cane. The reporter had been doing some work on the island, and had occasion to call on Mr. Corbin. It appears that the latter was not very gracious, and the reporter also lost his temper. The result was a row, in which Mr. Corbin was roughly handled.

AT Portage, Wis., Mrs. Patrick Riley lit the fire with kerosene. The explosion burned the woman so badly that she died in a few hours, and her husband was also badly burned. The house and its contents were burned.

BEFORE the Pacific Railway Investigating Commission, sitting at Denver, ex-Senator Hill testified that the Union Pacific freight rates had always been high, and the building of competing roads had not decreased them, though on the last year or two the rates had not been so high as formerly. He had been somewhat surprised when he read in the newspapers the published testimony of the commission taken at Omaha, showing the rebates allowed to the Omaha Smelting Company. The witness said his company, the Boston and Colorado Smelting Company—had not received any special rates or rebates, though it had received from the railroad company a refund of several items of overcharge. He thought Denver would have had 30,000 more population had it not been for discriminations against it in favor of Omaha. The witness had an interest in a Denver newspaper which paid $50 a ton freight on paper shipped from Chicago. A newspaper in San Francisco that used the same paper paid only $20 a ton freight from Chicago. Being asked whether that discrimination had existed since the passage of the interstate commerce law, the witness replied that it still continued, as the fourth clause of that law had been suspended by the Interstate Commerce Commission. He thought that if this investigating commission could get at one-tenth of the truth regarding discrimination it would be doing well.

A DISPATCH from Ironwood, Mich., says: "The bodies of all the people who perished in the flames at Hurley, ten in number, have been removed from the debris, but they are burned beyond recognition. The total number of lives lost by the accident is seventeen. It has been ascertained that John Sarvet, the stage coachman, who was badly burned, will die. Jennie Sheridan, who jumped from the third story window, escaped with slight injuries. Almost simultaneously with Miss Sheridan's leap Mrs. McCabe jumped full from the third-story window, and when carried from the place it was supposed that he was dead. Her husband also succeeded in jumping from the window-sill, and Sadie McCabe and Wesley Sarvet were seen to leave the hall. THE SOUTHERN STATES.

NINE men were killed by an explosion of giant-powder on a railroad near Columbia, South Carolina.

OLD JEFF DAVIS now charges that the Federal Government conspired during the late war to have him assassinated. He is out in a six-column interview in a Baltimore paper.

A NASHVILLE dispatch says a most remarkable occurrence followed a negro funeral at Mount Pleasant, Tenn., nine negroes being killed by a single stroke of lightning. A large party followed the remains of Harriet Terry to the grave, singing and shouting. The usual ceremonies at the grave were performed, and just as the final prayer had been said an immense cloud came up from the east. The party had scarcely left the grave when one of the most severe thunder and rain storms ever known in this section broke on them. All immediately made a break for the various trees scattered around the graveyard. Scarcely had those who were killed reached the shelter of an immense oak when the tree was struck by lightning. The whole party of nine tumbled down together and died instantly. The others who were affected rather by the storm were badly hurt, but were themselves unhurt. It was noticed that the part of the tree to which nearest the tree was scarred and their clothes torn. The most intense excitement prevailed, and the wailing and mourning of the frightened negroes was heartrending.

THE POLITICAL FIELD.

A NEW YORK dispatch says: "A house-to-house canvass is being made by the leaders of the United Labor, or Henry George, party, preparatory to the election of delegates to the Syracuse Convention. Mr. McMackin expects to be able to announce to the convention that the United Labor party is sure of carrying wards of the Assembly districts of New York City and of securing the balance of the assembly and a majority of the Board of Aldermen. So sure are the Labor men of carrying these districts that they will run a straight labor ticket and neither seek nor countenance any combination with Irving Hall or the Republicans."

THE NATIONAL CAPITAL.

AN extensive system of frauds upon the Government, involving wholesale forgery and perjury, has been unearthed in the horse-claims division of the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury at Washington. They were conceived and carried out by Oscar J. Harvey, late chief of the division. Harvey has been dismissed from the service, and was a few days ago arrested at Wilkesbarre, Pa., where he had been spending his vacation, and taken to Washington. He has made a full confession.

A WASHINGTON dispatch says it is practically settled that the President will not visit the West at all during the present year. The abandonment of his proposed visit to St. Louis has resulted in wholly changing whatever plans he had made for visiting Western cities. Following is the text of his letter to the St. Louis committee declining to visit that city:

While I have hitherto made no formal response to your invitation given in February last to visit and participate in the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic to be held in St. Louis, beginning on the fifth of September next, I have hoped that I might be able to do so. I regret if I should find it impossible to be in St. Louis at the time indicated.

The statements contained in your letter that the organization was never in a flourishing condition as now, and that never before was a larger, more representative gathering of comrades to unite in a welcome of mutual greeting, at which the two commanders-in-chief had every hold in a Southern State, and your suggestion that no opportunity should be hereafter given the valiant soldiers of the Republic to pay their respects to their chosen leader, are all most pleasant and highly appreciated than that conferred upon me by the unanimous action of the United city feeling and interest. More recently I have felt that the prevailing desire to see me personally was somewhat abated, and more earnestly you expressed the prevailing wish of the veterans of the Grand Army, there are members of your order who, from long association and friendship in respect to my acceptance, and that my acceptance of your invitation would be considered in the organization, as well as in the country, as an unfriendly discrimination against them. I have carefully considered all these opinions, and unmoved by any feeling, so flattering to myself, I have concluded that I should regard it my duty to refrain from contributing in any way to the disturbance of the peace and harmony of the country. I feel that the present situation is not free from danger. The country has been at peace with its former foes and is strained manifestation by the participants that patriotic fraternity of feeling suggested by the selection of St. Louis for holding the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic. I am constrained, therefore, to withdraw my proposed acceptance of your invitation, trusting no I assure you of my unfeigned hope and desire that I may be able to visit your city when more prepared for them by the beautiful and patriotic demonstrations of the veterans of the Grand Army may enjoy the most pleasant, profitable and useful reunion in their history. Very truly yours,

FOUR time ago John H. Oliver, a Justice of the Peace in the District of Columbia, was removed by the President. Oliver refused to surrender the office, on the ground that the law conferred the power of removal exclusively upon the Supreme Court of the District. The question was brought before that tribunal, which has just rendered a decision sustaining the action of the President in granting a writ of center against Magistrate Oliver.

THE INTERSTATE COMMISSION.

FARMERS in the vicinity of St. Thomas, Dakota, have filed complaints with the Interstate Commission against the Manitoba Railroad for charges for the transportation of wheat, and for collusion with the proprietors of certain elevators to fix the price of the grain.

THE INDUSTRIAL REALM.

—A conference of striking carpenters and their employers with the employers was held at St. Paul, Minn., and the strikes were declared off on the basis of nine hours a day, and wages the same as before the strike, for the present year; nine hours a day's work after Jan. 1. The bricklayers strike at Chicago is off, and men have gone to work at eight hours, and forty cents an hour. They agree to abolish the walking delegate.

THE FOREIGN BUDGET.

A CABLE dispatch from Berne, Switzerland, gives the following particulars of the disastrous landslide at Zug:

The disaster results in many respects the worst known of the Swiss mountain landslides. For several days crevices had been known to be forming in the Rossberg, and houses had been evacuated. The mass of rock, 1,000 feet in length, 900 feet in breadth and 600 feet in depth, fell into the lake, a dense spectacle of confusion. The falling rocks were precipitated into the lake, forming a wave 50 feet high, which another slip dragged seven feet further down the lake. The wave then followed, and a hundred yards forward. Two Italians going to rescue the survivors in the vicinity of Zug, only one fisherman escaped to the surface. All the survivors were in the lake, which were three miles distant, and were hurriedly removed from the threatened quarter. At 7 o'clock the land slips began again, and several more were heard during the night. Twenty-five houses and ten hotels disappeared within the space of half an hour. Zurich. A dispatch from Zurich says: The disaster at Zug is the most serious since the great slide at Elm, which buried 115 people. The inhabitants of the neighborhood of Zug, which had survived the first slide, fled from windows of houses to escape being crushed in the second slide, and were thus left homeless. The number is stated at 500. The survivors are coming into Zug from all sides to view the scene. A similar disaster occurred at Zug in 1435, when thirteen were buried. Advices from Berne, Switzerland, say that the expected revolution has occurred and that the Gibson ministry has fallen and a party followed the remains of Harriet Terry to the grave, singing and shouting. The usual ceremonies at the grave were performed, and just as the final prayer had been said an immense cloud came up from the east. The party had scarcely left the grave when one of the most severe thunder and rain storms ever known in this section broke on them. Professional Base-Ball Teams at Work—The League Pennant Race.

Chicago Still Playing at Wonderful Speed—Its Present Eastern Trip.

(CHICAGO CORRESPONDENCE.)

For the past two weeks the fight for the League pennant has been narrowing down to the three contestants in the race, Detroit, Chicago and Boston, and the prospects for last season's great struggle between Chicago and the White-Stockings being fought over again are improving with almost each day that passes. No one seems more strongly convinced than President Spalding that such will be the result, and when asked Saturday how he thought it would all end, he said: "Nothing that I know of now can stop us. We shall win the pennant in a gallop if our men continue to play the ball they are playing now, and even though we should meet with misfortune of any kind, such as the disabling of our players, possibly even through unfavorable weather, or, any of the other ills a ball club is heir to, we shall, I think, beat Boston and New York out at the finish, and take a good second place. We usually have a pretty fair share of luck, fortunately, and by the 15th day of August I expect to see Jones's team in the lead. I prefilled before the team returned to Chicago on June 9 that, before the end of our long Eastern trip, we should be in second place. You see I was right. I expect to see the team return to Chicago in first place, and I believe we shall be able to do so. As you see by the result of last week's Eastern trip, we shall be much too strong to be beaten by New York. There is an element of grit and nerve in the New York team that one cannot help admiring, and if they should really improve even now until the end of the season, it would not surprise me in the least. On the contrary, I rather anticipate that such will be the case.

"Is there any prospect that the Association or League will consolidate this fall? Well, I think it will drop out; or, that in the event of the failure of the two big organizations to become one, that the St. Louis Browns will be admitted to the League circuit."

"Well, it is as yet a little early to discuss such matters, is it not? It is the opinion that I have thought of all of them. In the first place, the idea of consolidation is in exactly the same state it has been in for the last two years. It is the acknowledged superiority of the St. Louis and Baltimore clubs that has kept the idea from materializing. But they are out of their class in the Association, and the mere question of number of consolidation has been considered or proposed in the time that I have been in politics. I can not say on the whole, though, that I am as anxious for the consolidation of the two organizations have represented me to be. The League is without question the greatest institution of the kind in the world. The Association is the most popular organization if you can, with aggregate salary limits, and with the cities and populations of fifty-three-quarters of a million, it is not to be wondered at that it draws 150,000 people to its performances in a single day, and I am free to say that it is a greater organization than the National League of American Ball Clubs. There is no comparison that I can see between the League and the Association.

"Would the League make any concessions to Von der Ahe, such as the privilege of playing Sundays, or any other of selling liquor upon his own grounds, in the event of his being admitted?

"No, sir; not a concession of any kind. If Mr. Von der Ahe wants to come in, we shall asked Saturday how he thought it would all end, he said: "Nothing that I know of now can stop us. We shall win the pennant in a gallop if our men continue to play the ball they are playing now, and even though we should meet with misfortune of any kind, such as the disabling of our players, possibly even through unfavorable weather, or, any of the other ills a ball club is heir to, we shall, I think, beat Boston and New York out at the finish, and take a good second place. "No, sir; not a concession of any kind. If Mr. Von der Ahe wants to come in, the League circuit next year, he may be able, if he will, to make concessions agreed to by the League Presidents, to do so, but if he does so he must do so without any of the same rules that govern us all, and no favors.

THE GOOD EFFECT OF TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

In speaking further upon the good effect of total abstinence as practiced by the Chicago players this season Mr. Spalding said: "I am no prohibition crank, but I do believe in the principle of Gladstone's Sabbath rest, and I have always felt that it was my duty and that it would be to my interest to see that my players who would shall enjoy admission because I do not drink myself I do not do so. But there is another side to the question, and I am not ashamed to admit that I am as a man in our team who when this new order of living has worked a wonderful change in a home that was not as happy as it should have been because of some poor fellow who was thought to be recognized, and on what I believe to be an enduring basis, I am not ashamed to say that some of this player's wife is not to be found in this city. They are using every day of their life to be contented. If the result of the temperance pledge has had only to reform this player I should have been quite satisfied. But it has had other wonderful results. We have young men in the club who have some of them—who take as much pride in their temperance record as they do in their ball-playing record. That is saying a good deal, but it is only the truth, and I know that it is true because I have asked them. I asked the boys not to think anything until they had thought it over, and I promised me that I meant what they would do. I said we should adopt no rule, but would leave it to them to decide whether they were keeping their pledges to me. It gives me a great satisfaction to say that no man has violated his pledge, and I believe that they feel that it is a good league away, but to so conduct themselves that they shall not be the cause of giving occasion for such a sad issue.

"Have the players shown by their second Eastern trip, which they opened last week by defeating the Philadelphia nine three straight games. They play Washington, Baltimore, Boston, and finish three games with each before returning home for a game in Chicago, on July 20, to New York. COL CROZIER.

HE WILL NOT BE THERE.

The President's Letter Declining to Attend the St. Louis Encampment.

He Gives in Full His Reasons for Believing It Is Better He Should Stay Away.

(Associated Press Telegram from St. Louis.)

The following letter, addressed to the Mayor of St. Louis, who was the chairman of the committee of representatives-elect of St. Louis who verbally invited the President to visit the city during the holding of the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic last September, explains itself without further comment:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, D.C., July 8, 1887.

The Hon. David R. Francis, Mayor and Chairman:

MY DEAR SIR—When I received the extremely cordial and gratifying invitation from the citizens of St. Louis, tendered by a number of my representative men, to visit that city during the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, I felt inclined to accept it, for some time the acceptance of an invitation so flattering to myself, and so honorable and so considerate, I felt, would be a source of well afforded me, it should be possible, to me. Not only would it give me great pleasure to meet the people of St. Louis and other cities in the West, but it would afford me a good opportunity to make a speech in which I felt I could be contributing to the success of the encampment and to the good of the country. The fact that my time has to promise the consideration of the duties pertaining to my office, is a source of pleasure it would give me.

Since the invitation was given the cordiality and enthusiasm with which it was received, and the kindness of the people who surrounded me during my visit to St. Louis, have strengthened my feeling which prompted me to accept the invitation. The Grand Army of the Republic is a great and patriotic organization, and I feel that it would be a great pleasure to me to be in the company of such men as I know it contains, and to be able to express to them the gratitude of the people of the country for the service they rendered to the country in the war for the Union. The earnest and patriotic spirit which has been manifested in the Southern States, every vestige of which has not disappeared since the last session of the Congress, which I have been in the habit of making a contract with the Republican Congressmen, and the Democrats in Congress. The latter gentlemen are now brought to a point, which demanding that they shall, if they shall again another their opinions and fly in the faces of their constituents, demanding the reduction of the tariff, they will meet certain defeat for renomination and re-election in 1888, and other and trustier Republicans will be chosen in their place. If a tariff bill should be brought before the Congress, it will be a bill which will not be in the interest of the country, and which will be vetoed. I do not mean to be understood that I am opposed to the reduction of the revenue by the repeal of the internal revenue taxes, which are obnoxious to the people, and which are collected at a cost to the Treasury out of proportion to the amount they yield. I am in favor of the repeal of the taxes on tobacco, and of the taxes on the manufacture of spirits, and of the taxes on banks and bankers, and on the transfer of property

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

Booming Towns.

Quite an effort has been made during the spring and early summer, by the citizens of numerous Michigan cities and villages to boom the town in which they live. Whatever natural advantages they possessed have been utilized to the utmost, and where there was a lack of natural advantages a fertile imagination has been drawn upon to furnish the material for a good sized boom. The people of Charlevoix, with facilities which few other towns in this state possess, have wisely refrained from any attempt to cause an unnatural growth or create fictitious values, while, as a matter of fact, there are few, if any, villages in Michigan which have so substantial a foundation upon which to build their hopes of increasing and permanent prosperity as this.

One remarkable thing is that since the town was first incorporated as a village, there has been a steady uninterrupted growth. Every year we have had an increase of population and an increase in the value of real estate. There has been no time when it has not been difficult to find a dwelling house for rent or a store building unoccupied. There has never been a time when it has been necessary to urge people to come here and start in business for the number has been constantly increasing without urging. The finances of the village have been carefully and judiciously managed by the common council that there has never been a suspicion of "boodle" connitness breathed, and the village has been kept clear from a burdensome debt, while our street improvements, in the way of grading and sidewalks, have kept pace with any other village in the state. And the fact that we have to-day more, and better sidewalks, better kept and cleaner streets, is attested by every visitor to our town.

We challenge competition between this village and any town in Michigan as to the amount of business done, in proportion to its size, since the first log house was built on the shore of Round lake.

This is not written with a view of booming Charlevoix. If that were intended we would employ a professional boomer, as so many of our neighbors have done. We are not in need of any spasmodic efforts in that direction, but as all strangers attest, we have the finest resorts in Michigan, one of the best harbors in the state, and when the D. C. & E. H. R., now in process of construction, is completed, our shipping facilities will be perfect, so that in locality, natural beauty and climate as well as business facilities Charlevoix is unequalled. We shall be glad to welcome any solid manufacturing establishment which, after looking the ground over, can see that their own interests will be best advanced by locating here and becoming a part of us.

Wool Crop, 1887.

The following statement showing the number of sheep and pounds of wool sheared in 1886, and number of sheep now on hand, is made up from the "farm statistics" as returned this spring by the supervisors of 1,046 townships, and carefully prepared estimates for the remaining townships in the state. Of the townships from which supervisors' reports have not yet been received, only 17 are in the southern four tiers of counties and 20 in the central counties.

The number of sheep sheared in the state in 1886 was 2,132,999, and number of pounds of wool 12,986,804, an average per head of 5 and 81-100 pounds.

The number of sheep on hand this spring is 2,004,749. At the same average per head as in 1886 the wool clip of the present year will amount to 11,627,070 pounds.

The number of sheep sheared in the southern counties in 1886 was 1,057,132, pounds of wool 11,295,501, an average per head of 5 and 82-hundredths pounds; number of sheep sheared in the central counties 158,148, pounds of wool 886,856, an average per head of 5 and 61-hundredths pounds, and number sheared in the northern counties 17,719, pounds of wool 104,447, an average per head of 5 and 89-hundredths pounds.

Spread the Good News, and let everyone know the benefits to be derived from the use of Parmelee's Blood Purifier. It thoroughly cleanses the system from all humors. It is a sure cure for scrofula, erysipelas, chronic sores, tumors, salt rheum, and all diseases indicating an impure condition of the blood. Price $1.00 per bottle. Sold by G. W. Crouter. 215

"When the bathing season arrives," remarked a natatorium professor the other day, "we'll hear of the usual maximum of drowning cases, and among them, as usual, a fair share of expert swimmers. The chief reason why good swimmers are so often drowned when they are accidentally thrown into the water is because the shock causes them to lose their presence of mind. The loss of presence of mind leads to paralysis of body, or to such wild exertions as accelerate drowning instead of contributing to preservation. The ability to behave wisely in case of sudden accidents can only be acquired by experience, just as everything else has to be acquired. The theory of the matter can be taught in swimming schools, but the practice must be acquired by experience. Hence, in some of the European swimming schools, the pupils are taken out boat riding and purposely upset, as though the upsetting were accidental. They are also suddenly pushed overboard and subjected to all manner of prepared accidents, so as to accustom them to acting in emergencies. In this way they learn how to behave in case of real accidents, and are protected against the loss of their presence of mind on occasions of danger on the water. They are also taught to have faith in the sustaining power of the water itself. They get to know that the water will sustain them if they will only render it the least help.

A finger laid upon an oar, or the gunwale of an overturned boat, or a board, or almost any floating substance, will sustain the human body in calm water. Persons who have been properly taught, and have acquired the habit of acting with self possession in the water when they are upset, do not attempt to climb upon the overturned boat, but simply take hold of it and quietly support themselves. A boat half filled with water, or completely overturned, will support as many persons as can get their hands upon the gunwale, if they behave quietly. In a case of accident, a person who understands and acts in accordance with these facts would stand a better chance of being saved, even if he were a poor swimmer, than an expert swimmer would stand who should lose his presence of mind.—Hebrew Journal.

A Hint to Music Teachers.

If teachers will only be induced to give to young scholars the simpler compositions of the best composers when the ambitious children begin to clamor for "pieces," instead of making them learn one after the other "The Rose Mazourka," or "The Lilac Waltz," or "The Flower Polka" and a dozen others of like character, by nobody knows whom, until the nerves of all the members of the family are quite worn out with the succession of tinkling tunes (for one cannot call them music), it would be a step in the right direction. I made such a suggestion in this to the mother of a pretty, bright little miss of some 12 or 13 summers, who was almost clever enough to hammer out the jingles musically, and the mother immediately insisted that she should be given some of Mendelssohn's exquisite "Songs Without Words."

Her teacher, or professor, if you like, replied: "Ah, madame, a year or two hence will be quite time enough for that." "But," insisted the determined mother, "I wish you would at once give my daughter some of the simple gondolier songs, and thus, by easy stages, take her on to the difficult ones." An unlucky thing she has to be amazed at, for her wishes being but little more than half out, the young pupil executes with delicate touch the soft, sweet airs of some half dozen of Mendelssohn overtures, and has developed a decided taste for the better class of music—is now well started on the road to a classical education in music, and the little thing criticises the efforts of her less fortunate companions in the most laughably learned manner, plainly showing her distaste for the waltzes and galops they still finger. If my little story of real life points a moral even to but few its mission on earth will indeed be beneficial to the world at large.—Chicago Herald.

Cruse for Stuffed Animals.

Now why do people, and especially small children, like stuffed animals? Because they are not sufficiently familiar with the living body of the animal to feel any shock on seeing the dead one. They raise no familiar action, they are ignorant of the proper curves and they think the glass eyes look so harmlessly "alive again." But that is a fault in training. They think their beautiful they do not see that the colors are dull, faded or ridiculously renovated with dye. Such is their ignorance that they feel at the presents felt when they saw the good father who had christened the child or calmed the sick startling up in a nice frock looking as good as new. Oh, crase stupor of the sense! blunteness of feeling for the reality of association! It is not the frock which makes the monk, it is not the fur which makes the squirrel, nor the wing nor the glass eye which brings back the song and the rustling of trees and the darting flight in the sunshine. Nothing but being unacquainted to the ways and action of the creature living makes that creature pleasant to us when it is no longer alive.—Belgravia.

Novelist James' Rapid Composition.

James T. Fields used to mention the novels of G. P. R. James as examples of rapid composition. When the novelist was in this city he was attended at his hotel every morning by an amanuensis, to whom he dictated page after page while strolling up and down the room, rarely hesitating for a word, but speaking so rapidly as the other could write. Mr. Fields once asked this young man if he were not glad when his morning task was finished, to which he replied in the negative. "Mr. James has an exasperating way," said the amanuensis, "of stopping in the middle of a chapter just when one has become intensely interested in the story, and I have to beg him to go on, as I am anxious to know how it will end." Even Poore's rapid dictation was probably not equal to the voluminous novelist's ready flow of words.—Boston Globe.

Playing Marbles.

In nearly all the Sussex villages not only boys, but grown up and even very old men, play at marbles on good Friday. It is considered as wrong to omit this solemn duty as to go without the Christmas pudding, etc.—Notes and Queries.

MICHIGAN MENTION.

Frankfort people are jubilant over their new salt well.

The peppermint crop promises well in Kalkaska county.

The state board of health will hold a sanitary convention at Traverse City, Aug. 24 and 25.

The steamer Ivanhoe left St. Ignace and made a trip without inspection papers, and was fined $100.

The fair of the state agricultural society at Jackson will open Monday, Sept. 7, and close the following Friday.

It is said that nearly half the salt product of the entire United States is credited to Michigan, whose supply is derived mainly from artesian borings.

Sault Morning Democrat is the daily issued at Sault Ste. Marie the past week during the National Water way Convention at that place. It is a neat and newsy sheet and appears to be having a hearty support.

The Justices of the supreme court are presented both by the engraver and in pen-portraits by Z. I. White, in the August number of the American Magazine. They are solid looking men, for the most part, with a decided development of avoirdupois.

The Michigan railway passenger agents have agreed to grant half rates to the soldiers' and sailors' gatherings at Ionia, Three Rivers and Adrian, and one and one-third rates to all state camp meetings, with one-half rate on two days. The rates to fairs were left with the next meeting, which will occur at Petoskey on the 18th of August.—Evening Journal.

The Prince Not Hopeful.

The Prince of Wales is, perhaps, the firmest friend of America among the English. He is a man of the world, more Parisian when in Paris than the Parisians, but his open sympathy with Americans is founded upon a shrewd forecast of the future. To one of his suite, now resident in New York, the prince stated in plain terms that he never expected to be the king of England, nor did he leave his mother's side without a doubt if she would outlive him or that England was destined to become a republic. "Another will lie in the coffin of the monarch," he unfeelingly remarked when the engagement of the Princess Louise to the Marquis of Lorne was announced to him. The prince is far from being the careless pleasure seeker that he is too often represented. He is a thoughtful observer and student of events, and complaints as well as anybody else of the tendencies of the times. If he makes the best of the present, it is evident that he is anxiously making friends for the future, and seeking to stand well with all parties and all classes in case of emergencies. This is one of the most pregnant lessons of the jubilee year.—London Letter.

Saved His Life.

Mr. D. I. Wilkerson, of Horse Cave, Ky., says he was, for many years, afflicted with phthisic, also diabetes; the pies were almost unendurable, and would sometimes almost throw him into convulsions. He tried Electric Bitters and got relief from first bottle and after taking six bottles was entirely cured, and had gained in flesh in pounds. Says he positively believes he would have died, but it not been for the relief afforded by Electric Bitters. Sold at 50 cents a bottle by Dr. G. W. Crouter.

Don't Experiment.

You cannot afford to waste time in experimenting when your lungs are in danger. Consumption always seems at first only a cold. Give Them a Chance!

That is to say, your lungs. Also all your breathing machinery. Very wonderful machinery it is. Not only the larger air-passages, but the thousands of little tubes and cavities leading from them.

When these are clogged and choked with matter which ought not be there, your lungs cannot half do their work. And what they do, they cannot do well.

Call it cold, cough, croup, pneumonia, catarrh, consumption, or any of the family of diseases these and head lung obstructions, all are bad. All ought to be got rid of. There is just one sure way to get rid of them. That is to take Boschee's German Syrup, which any druggist will sell you at 75 cents a bottle. Even if everything else has failed you, you may depend upon this for certain.

The Appetite

May be increased, the Digestive organs strengthened, and the Bowels regulated, by taking Ayer's Pills. These Pills are purely vegetable in their composition. They contain neither calomel nor any other dangerous drug, and may be taken with perfect safety by persons of all ages.

I was a great sufferer from Dyspepsia and Constipation. I had no appetite, everything greatly debilitated, and was constantly affected with Headache and Dizziness. I consulted our family doctor, who prescribed for me, at various times, without benefit. I was more than temporary relief. I finally commenced using Ayer's Pills, and in a short time my digestion and appetite my bowels were regulated, and, by the time I finished two boxes of these Pills my tendency to headaches had disappeared, and I became strong and well.—Darius Lyons, Washington, Del.

I was troubled, for over a year, with Loss of Appetite, and General Debility. I commenced taking Ayer's Pills, and before finishing half a box of this medicine, my appetite and strength were restored.—C. O. Clark, Danbury, Conn.

Ayer's Pills are the best medicine known to me for regulating the bowels, and for all diseases caused by a disordered Stomach and Liver. I suffered for years from these ills, with Headache, Indigestion, Loss of Appetite, and Nervous Prostration. I had no appetite, and was weak and nervous most of the time.

BY USING

three boxes of Ayer's Pills, and, at the same time, using Ayer's Ague Cure, I was completely cured. My digestive organs are now in good order, and I am in perfect health.—Philip Lockwood, Topeka, Kans.

Ayer's Pills have proved to me wonderfully. For months I suffered from Indigestion and Headache, was restless at night, and had a bad taste in my mouth every morning. After taking one box of Ayer's Pills, all these troubles disappeared, and I feel digested well, and sleep was refreshing.—Henry C. Hemmenway, Rockport, Mass.

I was cured of the Piles by the use of Ayer's Pills. They not only relieved me of this painful disorder, but gave me increased vigor, and improved my health.—John Lazarus, St. John, N. B.

Dr. Peters, of Grand Rapids, has been treating him, and he expects to resume his duties next week. He speaks in high terms of Dr. Peters as an oculist, and recommends all afflicted with any difficulty of the eye to call on him for treatment.

Last week, Alvan Dodge, inspector of hulls, after examination considered the propeller A. C. VanRaalte, as unseaworthy. She was taken from the Manistique route and tied up. Several years ago she was condemned by the local inspector but an appeal to the supervising inspector the decision was reversed. Since then many rumors of unsafety have been afloat, yet she seems to be a favorite boat. It is unfortunate to have her taken off the route at this time.

Mr. C. Green, of Central Lake, will canvass Charlevoix and vicinity, about the first week in August, for a book of about seven hundred pages, by John D. West, M. D., of Chicago, entitled "Ten Phases of Woman's Life." The book purports to show how to protect the health, contribute to the physical and mental development, and increase the happiness of womankind, and is recommended by numerous physicians who have examined it. Mr. Green's long acquaintance in this region will no doubt insure him many orders.

Base Ball.

Last Friday afternoon the Evart team, leaders of the Northern Michigan league, played a game of base ball with the Charlevoix team at Dixon park, that was well contested throughout, notwithstanding the large score. As this was the first time that Evart has been beaten since they have played up here, our base ball people feel very enthusiastic about the possibilities of our club. Vogel and Klock were the battery for Charlevoix. Evart tried a new man in the box, but at the end of the sixth inning Whalen was substituted, but the run-getting went on just the same; every one of our boys knocking the ball when at bat. Burnett at center field made two difficult catches of fly balls. Vogel for the Charlevoix pitched a splendid game, sending but two men to bases on balls, and being credited with striking out seven men, and Klock's support of him was good, he having but four passed balls. Below is the official score:

Torch Lake and Charlevoix played a game of ball on the home ground last Monday afternoon. Torch Lake had nothing but an amateur team, and at the end of the game the score was as follows:

Innings	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Charlevoix	0	4	0	2	1	0	4	1	7—19

On Tuesday afternoon the amateurs played a game with the professionals. The amateurs were assisted by Vogel, Klock, and Gish, of the professionals. It was one of the best games of the season. Klock and Gish filled the points for the amateurs, and Burnett and Kraft for the professionals. Below is the score by innings:

Innings	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Professionals	0	0	0	0	2	0	1	0	0—3
Amateurs	0	0	0	4	2	0	1	0	0—7

Cearlevoix will play Cheboygan Friday and Saturday of this week at Cheboygan, and with Petoskey next Wednesday.

An Old Fashioned Game.

An old fashioned game of base ball will be played between the resorts today. Game called at 3 p. m. at Dixon's park. 10 cents admission will be charged for the benefit of the Charlevoix Library Association. The rules governing the game will be the same as used a quarter of a century ago. Prof. William will probably umpire the game. The following are the names of the players:

Chicago Resort—S. M. Moore, N. H. Blatchford, Lucian Barr, F. B. Rockwell, Thomas Rockwood, D. S. Munger, N. W. Edgar, A. B. Mead, Prof. J. B. Allen, Prof. S. I. Curtis, Dr. Carlstein, Hon. A. Buttars, John Nicholls and A. Pierson.

Wilson.

Haying is nearly over.

Thermometer stood 96 in the shade recently.

The Bethel Sunday school is to hold a picnic in August.

The shower on Saturday night was a blessing to this part of the county.

A great many trees were blown down on Saturday during the storm.

We hear of quite a little sickness, and Mrs. Geo. Tuttle and Richard Lewis are now on the sick list.

Rev. May and Rev. Tracy and their families went to the M. P. camp-meeting Wednesday, to be held at Thumb Lake.

As Rev. Mr. Tracy went to camp meeting, Rev. Mr Scofield filled his appointment over Sunday, at the schoolhouse at four o'clock.

The 4 nation for Elder Tracy at the school house on Monday night, was not very widely circulated and but few attended. It netted about $10.

Burgess.

Mr. Murry is still confined to the house with his sprained ankle received several weeks ago.

The neck tie social held at Maple Grove school house last Wednesday evening was a success both socially and financially.

Mr. Eugene Light and wife, of Bay City, and Geo. Long, wife and son, of Evangeline, were visiting at Mr. Peter Kane's last Saturday.

Frank Snethan cut an ugly gash in his foot with an axe while at work in the woods, and came very near bleeding to death before assistance could be had.

July 28th.

Eveline.

Harvesting makes busy times for the farmers. Big crops of wheat and hay.

Mr. and Mrs. Joe Stutzman of Dwight's made us a pleasant visit Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Bedwin, of South Hayes was in Eveline Sunday, visiting his mother.

Miss Anna Cooper closed a very successful term of school at Advance on Friday, the 15th.

Miss Jennie Dewar of Charlevoix, visited her sister Mrs. G. McDonald over Saturday and Sunday.

A good many from this town took in the excursion to Petoskey and Bay View on Sunday, on the Friant and Cummings.

Nathan L. Cash and Henry Knowland, of this place, are chosen directors of the Charlevoix County Agricultural Society.

The show given by the Russell family at Ironton last Wednesday evening was a pretty good show and was quite well attended.

A fine little boy baby arrived at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Henry last Wednesday, July 20. Both child and mother are doing well.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Zimmermain lost their infant son last Thursday morning, aged eleven days. They have the sympathy of all in their trouble.

Mrs. James Friel and daughter Mary, of Ironton, left last Wednesday for Detroit. They go on account of the poor health of Miss Mary, who has been ill for some time.

Mr. S. T. Marshall, of Ironton, who leased the boarding house and store of Wm. Ferguson at Charlevoix, left last Wednesday to take possession. We wish Mr. Marshall success.

Joe Tuttle returned home last Friday from Boyne City where he has been having medical treatment for nearly two weeks. He left the same day for Petoskey, where he will visit for a while.

Mr. W. H. Rampton, an artist, from Traverse City, was through Eveline last week taking views of houses, etc., for some of our neighbors. He also visited other parts of the county taking pictures. He had some fine views with him of different houses in this county.

July 26th.

South Hayes.

Rather warm again.

Mr. Snyder is on the sick list this week.

Green corn is on the bill of fare at present.

Rev. B. H. Whitman is in Hayes for a couple of days this week.

Whitford and Cram have got all their hardwood logs sawed and only have a few nice now to saw.

Mr. John Ackert, wife and family have been visiting at his uncle's, Mr. P. Ackert, during the latter part of last week.

THE OLD FASHIONED DOCTOR.

BY H. C. DODGE.

"Don't you remember the old fashioned doctor
Who, when we were children, would enter the door
And, looking as wise as an owl or a proctor,
Would frighten and fill us with thoughts of slaughter?
"He'd stalk to our cradles and cedar us gruffly,
To stick out our tongues, which we'd do with such dread,
And give, while he handled our pulses so roughly,
An obnoxious shake of his solemn old head.

"And then, while he listened to mother's dolorous story,
Of things we had eaten and what we had done,
He grimly would write his one hackneyed recipe
For the noxious medicines under the sun.

"Those horrible doses. How mother would scold us
And tug us and bruz us to take 'em in vain.
And O, how we'd struggle when father would hold us
And squeeze shut our noses regardless of pain.

"And, when forced to open our mouths, quickly to gulp
Would shove in a spoonful that strangled us off
We spluttered it out—just in time for another,
It was oily, detestable, in our memory still.

"But goodness that old fashioned doctor is dead
With sweet candy pellets and powders in lieu,
Where little toddlers who take 'em so splendid
That even the well ones cry for 'em too.

ALL TRIPP'S FAULT.

BY MARY ANTEBHIEM.

"Why, Mary, how late you are!" exclaimed Mary Morrison's father, a farmer living near Weston, Cheshire. "If you don't mind myself to take it first your place. The boys have got half through."

"Oh, never mind, father!" said pretty Mary, relieving him of his milk-pail and a very heavy one it was. "A gentleman has been taking my place."

"Your picture, eh? Good evening, sir. I suppose you are one of them artist chaps at the tavern?"

The gentleman referred to, a handsome young fellow, bowed. "Yes, we are of "them chaps." And in proof thereof, he opened his portfolio. Mary glided off towards the barnyard, the old man gazed with an open mouth at her portrait.

"That's her, sure enough; and the cows couldn't be better if you had stuck them in there just as they be in the yard. And Trip, too, you can tell he hasn't just coming out of his mouth. I vow it's wonderful! I say, sir, I should like to see how you do it."

"You shall. Come this way."

The artist crossed the road, followed by the farmer, and sat down near the barnyard. Mary sat among a group of milkers, her tongue running fast about her portrait, while she leaned her pretty head against the spotted side of old Molly, and watched her rapidly-filling pail. Before the work was over, the quick pencil had caught them all and grouped them around that centre figure, like stars around the moon—like a rustic court attending upon their rustic queen.

"Well, it beats all!" ejaculated the farmer. Mary, he's made another picture of you!"

She came out, smiling and blushing.

"Dear me, sir, I wanted to smooth my hair and change my dress before you took me again."

"We will let that pe till I come another time," said the artist, gravely, as he closed his book. "It's almost time for me to go."

"Come in for a moment and take a cup of new milk," said the farmer, heartily. "That's what you don't get in London, Mr——"

"My name is Curtis Howard, sir. You are right, I never get milk there, and I will trouble Miss Mary."

"Miss Mary" hurried away to wash her hands and return her jug to the dairy. She came back with the milk the artist stood in the open parlor door, sighting with her father as if he had known him for years.

"Yes, I go to-morrow," he said, in answer to a question, just as she entered; and it was well he took the milk, or she might have dropped it. He looked at her keenly; a deep blush covered her face; he sighed and raised a glass to his lips.

"Your health, Miss Mary, and a good husband to you."

The old man burst out laughing; Mary put the empty glass away with a small pain at her heart. She had often been joked about a husband before, yet somehow she did not like to hear this stranger joke about it. She would never marry—not she!

The evening passed swiftly away, and the village clock struck nine. The artist rose to go.

"Good-bye," he said, "and many thanks for your hospitality."

"Good-bye, sir! If ever you come this way, drop in and stay a week or two with us. Mary here will take good care of you, and you can make pictures of her to your heart's content."

"Thank you—you are very kind, and if I am near you I will call to accept the invitation. Miss Mary, may I venture to ask one thing of you in memory of this pleasant visit?"

"What can I give you, sir?" she said in a voice that trembled, though she tried to keep it steady.

"That flower, if you will."

He pointed to the rose on her bosom. She unfastened it, and seeing a thorn upon the stem, removed it before she placed it in his hand. He smiled sadly.

"Thank you. May all your roses be thornless for ever! I will finish your picture, and perhaps you may see it again some day. Good-bye, now."

He held out his hand. She gave him hers. The old farmer had already made two steps towards the gate and stood with his back towards them, gazing out towards his beloved barn-yard and the fields beyond. Two pair of eyes looked into each other's depths; two pair of lips met softly; two hearts gave a quick bound! And then the artist went away. It was quite time for him to do so.

So Curtis Howard went away about this business, and Mary returned to her duties, and Mary returned to her duties, and was first to scheme of perfect happiness with less.

De Lesseps's Second Wife.

Count de Lesseps has been twice married, and his present wife is more than a quarter of a century his junior. There is a romance connected with the marriage. Her name was Eugenie Braga, and his friends at Paris were wont, in speaking of her, to compare the courtship to that of Romeo and Desdemona, says Carp in the Cleveland Leader. One of Eugenie's letter published in London five years ago, told the story of it as follows:

Like Othello, De Lesseps was his present beautiful wife is the narration of his adventures and dangers. M. de Lesseps is now on the verge of 80, yet in spite of his great age he retains the hopefulness and freshness of youth, and he has been compared, in this respect, to Pythagoras, Plutarch, Alexander von Humboldt, and even to those heroes of Indian legend who owed their lives to their vows. At the age of 75 M. de Lesseps was left a widower, and had a troop of grown-up sons and daughters. Some few years after it was reported, to the astonishment of the world, that the lively septuagenarian had married a young creole maiden of astonishing beauty, who has since brought him six children. In a certain Parisian family where he was for years often visited there was a bevy of five sisters. The old man delighted to amuse them around him with relate stirring episodes from his travels. One day, while speaking of his experiences in Palestine, he said that he had undergone great dangers and difficulties among the Arabs because they could not conceive how a man could live without a wife. The young ladies and sisters innocently asked: "Why, then do you not marry?" "Because I am too old," replied M. de Lesseps. "Besides, he added, "if I were to fall in love with a young girl, it would be absurd to think that she would fall in love with me." "Who know?" the sisters in chorus questioned. Lesseps told his young listeners about the story of Jeriko, which, after being dried and placed in water, again bursts into life.

Soon afterward he obtained one of these roses and presented it to the young girls. In a few days she appeared with the rebloomed rose in her hand, which she gave to the latest guest, saying at the same time: "see what a miracle the water has effected upon the rose. It is the blossoming offspring of old age." Their eyes met, and M. de Lesseps, believing that his Desdemona had a meaning in what she said, quietly said: "If you really think that you dare venture to share the remaining years of an old man, here is my hand." But for his sincerity it is very uncertain whether the bold proposal would have undertaken his laborious task at Panama. She is always at his side, and has shown her chief help and support throughout his arduous conflicts with politicians, money-lenders, inquirers and laborers.

Persian Rugs.

Persian rugs are made by hand, without a single exception. They are stretched on frames as one would make a sampler, and all the family work on them. A pattern for that particular carpet is before them, which they follow with more or less precision, according as their fancy tells them. As a rule, considerable latitude is allowed for the expression of individual taste in working out these patterns. No two carpets are therefore exactly alike, and the owner of an old Persian rug may be reasonably certain that while he may find other rugs resembling his, not one will be found of a identical exists. This quality gives them a value similar to that possessed by an oil painting.

The Persian government has interdicted the use of aniline dyes, which threatened at one time to ruin the soft harmonious tints of the products of the Persian looms. The rugs of Turkestan (mistakenly called Bokhara rugs) are dyed with aniline freely, since Turkestan is now under Russian rule instead of Persian rule; and the introduction of machine methods and exact reproductions into Schamachan and Turkestan, which has recently taken place may prove a death blow to this peculiarly industrial art. There is one kind of rug made in Persia which never leaves that country, on account of its great weight and bulk and consequent cost of transportation. This is a kind of carpet felt, called Jamids. The ground is made first, the designs being beaten in with mallets on one surface only. Another rug which rarely reaches Europe is the "gilitem," made wholly or partly of cotton. The rich colors are imperishable, and the rug can be washed like a piece of calico. The so-called silk rugs are used almost entirely for hangings. They are rare, and of course very costly. The Largest Farm in the World.

In the extreme southwest corner of Louisiana lies the largest producing farm in the world. It runs 100 miles north and south and 7 miles east and west, and is owned and operated by a syndicate of Northern capitalists. Their general manager, J. H. Watkins, gives an interesting account of this gigantic plantation, which throws the great Dalrymple farm in Dakota in the shade completely. The 1,000,000 acres of our tract, Mr. Watkins said, was purchased in 1882 from the State of Louisiana and from the United States Government. At that time there was vast grazing land for the cattle of the few dealers of the neighborhood. When I took possession I found only 20,000 head of half-wild horses and cattle. My work was to divide the immense track into convenient pastures, establishing stations or ranches every six miles. The fencing alone cost in the neighborhood of $50,000. The land I found to be best adapted to rice, sugar, corn and cotton. All our cultivating, ditching, etc., is done by steam power. We take a front, say half a mile for instance, and place an engine on each side. The engines are portable and operate a cable attached to four plows, and under this arrangement we are able to plow thirty acres a day with only the labor of three men. Our harrowing planting and other cultivation is done in a like manner. In fact, there is not a single draught horse on the entire place. We have, of course, horses for the herders of cattle, of which we now have 100,000 head, and the Southern Pacific Railroad runs for thirty-six miles through our farm. We have three steamboats operating on the waters of our estate, upon which there are 300 miles of navigable waters. We have an ice house, a bank, a shipyard and a rice mill.

Mirrors—How They are Made.

"There are three kinds of mirrors known to commerce," said a London glass maker to a St. Louis Globe writer, "the French plate, the German plate and the common American plate, usually called stocks. The latter can be told by their tendency to grow yellow and spotted in the air, or a more or less successful effort to get both eyes on the same plane. The German plate is imported in regular sizes, already silvered. It is a very good article, very durable and comes about one-fifth cheaper than the French plate, which is used altogether for first-class mirrors. The difference can be told by pressing the finger on the face of the glass, by which the thickness can be readily perceived. There are three factories in the United States manufacturing plate glass, but none of them has yet reached the point of producing perfect whiteness and freedom from bubbles. Imperfections that are passed over there would be more prominent when silvered. Silvering quality glass, as it is known, is only selected by the French manufacturers and sold for that purpose at a much higher price than the balance of the product. There are two ways of silvering, the old method, mercury being used for one and nitrate of silver for the other. The latter is known as patent backs, although not patented, and are generally preferred because of the danger of pretty-development in handling. In the former process a sheet of tin foil, somewhat larger than the mirror wanted, is placed upon a level table, and the glass, plate or other marble, and which must be absolutely clear and free from even the slightest scratch, is laid upon the foil, after which the plate is flooded on and entirely covered with heavy iron weights. The table is then tilted and the surplus mercury drains off, after which they are stood on edge to dry, which requires from one to two weeks. In making a 'patent back' the glass is laid on a table underneath which is a steam coil. The nitrate of silver in solution is then poured on, a reducer applied, and the silver precipitated. The back is then painted and the process is complete. Either process requires a great amount of skill and experience, the knowledge is comparatively necessary in every part of the work. Distilled water is used in cleaning the plate preparatory to silvering, and a drop of perspiration or dust spoils the work."

Proverbs Relating to Clouds.

No one can be in doubt that those who observe the clouds can make pretty shrewd guesses at the weather. Proverbs have grown in twenty-four hours, relating to clouds are very numerous, and we give a few of those which are applicable at this time of the year, and we give a few of those which are applicable at this time of the year. Proverbs relating to clouds are very likely to be followed by a gale of wind.

A MISER AND HIS MONEY.

Remarkable Circumstances in the Case of Old Paine and His Money.

For some time there was over a third of a million in good money that would pass anywhere at its face value, and only one man in all the world knew where it was, for it was hidden in a place that was not exactly a place, it was money instead of rubbish; and for nearly a score of years it lay untouched in its hiding place; and then the old man who knew it was money died without giving a hint to any body about it, and the other man, discovering that it was money, and not rubbish, had informed the heirs about it, and the result was a great contest in the courts. The contest became so famous, and people speak of it as the Paine will fight, the point at issue being as to whether there is any such thing as a Paine will. The contest is not yet finished, although the testimony is all in, and the whole story about that vast sum of money has never been told, and probably never will be. It has not even been told people that for nearly a year the $400,000, which astounded the court, was in the Garfield National bank in this city. Everybody has heard of the old people who lived in a hovel, and newspapers which Mr. Charles Chickering found in his office, were used for bedsacks and stacks of greenbacks. Without waiting to count them he hurried off to Boston and brought a deputation of the heirs back, and together they counted the stack of greenbacks. Once in the seventeen years Miser Paine had asked Mr. Chickering if he had put a dollar in his safe had the owner inquired about it, casually asking Mr. Chickering if his money was all right. And Mr. Chickering had replied that it was still there, and he believed it would take it away. When the money had been counted Mr. Chickering took it to the Garfield bank, and went into the president's room, a little office in the back part of the building, Mr. Cheney was there, and, when visitors had withdrawn, Mr. Chickering said to him:

"I have a package here that I would like to leave with you for safe keeping."

"Very well," said President Cheney, "I guess we can accommodate you."

The package was laid on the desk and the gentlemen discussed some inconsequential remarks about business and the weather, and then Mr. Chickering came to go. The president observed that the package ought to be marked in some way for identification.

"It is marked," replied Mr. Chickering, with his hand on the door-knob.

President Cheney looked it over. He saw nothing but a roll of paper about the size of a newspaper wrapping without punctuation, as if some one had been making a rough calculation. It did not occur to him that they conveyed any significance, written as they were in pencil. He glanced inquiringly at Mr. Chickering, and saw that gentleman had a queer smile upon his face. Mr. Cheney scrutinized them again. "This is what he said:

"You don't mean to say," he exclaimed in the utmost astonishment, "that this is the money?"

"That's just it in cash," said Mr. Chickering.

President Cheney called the cashier in, and, pointing to the package, said: "Mr. Paine, Mr. Chickering wants us to take care of this, and that is what he has done."

Mr. Vail looked at the unpunctuated figures, glanced up at Mr. Chickering, and then looked at the figures again, glanced at Mr. Cheney and then glanced from one to the other in astonishment himself that the gentlemen opposite what they said, and he inquired, he first in a low breath, and remarked:

"Well, I should think that Mr. Chickering had better put his name to it. It is order to identify it in case he should need some day."

This sensible step was taken, but Mr. Chickering did not feel like it was proper when he had to produce in court the property of Mr. Paine. The contents of the $40,000 in certificates of deposit had been added to the original package, so as to keep until these were given to Mr. Cheney to send through the mail some more money it was that he had in his safe.

"I think it makes one of the most astounding cases in history," said Mr. Cheney, in conversation on the subject, "that people who had a million dollars in clear cash, with not a mark of the painter upon it, should let any portion of it be belonging to anybody other than the holder of it. Even the certificates of deposit were so drawn that Paine's name was not mentioned, and, as they were indorsed, anybody under heaven might have got the money on them on presentation. And if Mr. Chickering had made any disposition of the funds for his own benefit, no one ever would have missed them, for no one knew that they were in existence. And it seems grimly sublime that, after he had kept the money honestly for half a century, and then generally notified the heirs of its existence, he should have had to give bonds to secure the proper disposition. When Mr. Chickering was approached by the heirs to become executor of the estate, he declined, saying that he should have to travel a great deal in his business, and didn't want the trouble. But they declared that he should not be put upon them, and that they were willing to trust him, but when the enormous pile was discovered, and the heirs instantly demanded bonds, and Mr. Chickering had to furnish them.—New York Sun.

A Matter of Evolution.

A physiologist has launched a theory that woman's fondness for scents is due to her defective sense of smell. It is a matter of evolution. In the early stages of his physical and intellectual development man had to employ his nose in the pursuit of game, while in women, engaged in domestic work, the sense of smell was not exercised. It is said that women, owing to their defective sense of smell, can endure a perfume which is quite overpowering to men.

VARIETIES OF HANDSHAKING.

How the Custom First Originated—Peculiarities of Different People.

"Did you ever consider how people first began to shake hands? No? Well, then, sit down here and I'll tell you what I think about it, for I have given this subject some study," said a gentleman to a reporter. "My opinion is that in early and barbarous times, when every savage or semi savage was his own lawgiver, judge, soldier and policeman, and had to watch over his own safety, in default of all other protection, when two friends or acquaintances, or two strangers desiring to be friends or acquaintances, when they chanced to meet, offered each to the other the right hand alike of offense and defense—the hand that wields the sword, the dagger, the club, the tomahawk or other weapon of war. Each did this to show that the hand was empty and that neither war nor treachery was intended. A man cannot well stab another while he is engaged in the act of shaking hands with him, unless he be a double-dyed traitor and a villain and strives to slim a cowardly blow with the left while giving the right and pretending to be on good terms with him.

"Did you ever observe that the ladies never shake hands with the cordiality of men unless it be with men other than the reason is obvious. It is for them to receive homage, not to give it. They cannot be expected to show to persons of the other sex a warmth of greeting which might be misinterpreted unless such persons are very closely related, in which case handshaking is not needed and the lips do more agreeable duty.

"Every man shakes hands according to his nature, whether it be timid or assertive, proud or humble, courteous or churlish, vulgar or refined. There is certainly a great art in handshaking, but I tell you the kind of handshake I hate, and that is one of the what I call the jolly good fellow handshakes. One of these fellows will grasp your hand, squeeze it until the tears run down your cheeks and then, using your arm in the same manner as a pump handle, will go on shaking all the time he is talking to you, letting it rest easy for a moment or so, with the exception of a little spasmodic shake now and again, only, however, to start it afresh. The first time you imagine he is doing it because he is extremely glad to see you, but when you see him manifest the same cordiality toward people whom he met for the first time yesterday and toward those with whom he has been intimate for years you know he is a humbug or is, at any rate, acting from habit. But of all the men to be avoided the man who squeezes your hand in an excruciating manner on a false pretense is the worst. He dislocates your joints to convince you that he regards you highly, and as soon as you are out of sight forgets you or thinks that you are no 'great shakes' after all, or, worse still, abuses you behind your back.

"Another and even more odious kind of handshaker is he who offers you his hand, but will not permit you to get fair hold of it. To be treated with cool contempt or supercilious scorn which such a mode of salutation implies is worse than not to be shaken at all. If hands are to be shaken let it be done properly. Another species of handshaker I detest is the man who offers you one finger instead of five, as much as to say, 'I am too elevated to condescend to give you my whole hand.' With such a man the interchange of any text the barest and scantest courtesy is rendered difficult by any one who has a particle of self respect.

"Yet another objectionable man is the one that shoves out his left hand in greeting you. That is discourteous, sometimes intentional and sometimes not, but it is an act that no true gentleman would commit. There is really no reason why it should be more discourteous than to kiss the left cheek instead of the right, but doubtless the custom that makes the right hand imperative in all sincere salutations dates from those early times when handshaking first began, and the hand that shook or was shaken in friendship was of necessity weaponless. The poor left hand that one would think ought to be of as much value and strength as the right, just as the left foot or leg, because strong as the right foot or leg, because they are both used equally, has fallen into disrepute as well as into comparative disuse, until it has become an expression, phrase to any of any proceedings that is clouds, that it is either doubtful or that it is left handed.

"I do not," he continued, "object to shake hands on certain occasions, but it is this perpetual shake, shake, with everybody that I object to. It is pleasant to touch the hand of an honest man or woman, and to be on such terms of acquaintanceship with either of these that the thought that you are their equal, Even to grasp the paw of an intelligent dog, who holds it up for you to shake on being asked to do so, is something pleasant. For the dog, unless some mutt would scorn to give his paw to one in whose eye and in whose face he, by the fine instinct, in some respects the equal if not the superior of reason, discovered treachery or evil. As I have said, it is the continued hand shaking with Tom, Dick and Harry that ought to be put a stop to.—Chicago News.

People Partially Unsound.

In the form of insanity generally known as monomania—but for which the term paranoia is now preferred—the person shows signs of mental unsoundness only on particular subjects, or under special conditions.

Many persons who are thus partially unsound are attracted to this country from Germany and Italy, and really pass as sane until long after their arrival, and rear families disposed to insanity. The proportion of such persons of German and Italian parentage found in our asylums is double that in the asylums of their ancestral country.—Youth's Companion.

Japan's Music to be Europeanized.

Japanese native music is now to be Europeanized. A conservatory will shortly be organized at Tokio, on the model of the Viennese conservatory, where Japanese musicians will be trained on the most approved system of western musical study.

Log Drivers in Maine.

The peels of "rivermen" in getting down the drives are but little known to the outside world, especially when there is a jam, and the attempt is made to break it. When one of these big jams occurs it requires not only skill, but a great deal of daring, to start it. Oftentimes it is a marvel how those spike booted fellows, armed with their steel spike poles and cant dogs, escape with their lives. When the huge mass of logs wedges in between the banks of the river, apparently inextricable, confusion comes. But these brave, tough men have pluck, perhaps, as many lives. When the jam is started and the resistless, turbulent waters set the wrenching and cross bound logs to spinning and plunging downward in a tremendous roar, the agility and recklessness which they display in leaping from log to log, to reach the shore in safety, forms as exciting a spectacle as one would care to witness.

Most of these log drivers are French Canadians. There has been a great change of late years in the nationality of those who handle the woodman's ax, and who work on the rivers. Formerly Yankee crews were generally employed, now a foreign labor is chiefly hired from the provinces. There is an army of "P. E. I. men," as they are known, hired by the Penobscot lumbermen, who come from Prince Edward Island. There is more or less feeling shown by the Yankee rivermen toward the French Canadians who work with them, which frequently culminates in desperate fights. "The Yorks" of the Kennebec has been often the scene of these bloody encounters in the early spring months when the driving season opens, and later on during the summer months when the "Kaintucks" come down the Canada road to hire out to the Maine haymakers. Generally, Canadian "wild whisky," as it is called, at the bottom of these fights, which usually wind up with a score of Kennebecker getting their faces sally dissfigured, especially if any of the notorious Bear family take a hand in these fistic battles.—Augusta (Me.) Letter.

The Islands of the Pacific.

In addition to the two large islands recently discovered in the Pacific ocean, a third has just been discovered lying less than 100 miles from the northern coast of New Guinea. It has been named Allison Island, is nearly three miles long, rises about 100 feet to 150 feet above the sea, and has abundant timber. Several stretches of fertile and inhabited land, some of them much larger than Allison Island, have been found within a few years at a distance of 5° or 300 miles from the New Guinea coast, and similar discoveries are made once in a while in various parts of the Pacific. Although the maps of the Pacific ocean are studded with islands which appear to be lying close together, vessels may sail among these islands for weeks together without once coming in sight of land. So vast is the waste of waters, that not long ago a crew which had been shipwrecked in the great island region of the Pacific rowed south forty days before they reached Hawaii, the nearest land.

Mr. A. R. Wallace, who has traveled widely in the Pacific, has expressed the opinion that there are still a great many islands which have never yet been seen by white men. Now and then a Pacific trader finds some new or little known island, and opens trade with its inhabitants. When the Woodlark islands were explored some time ago, it was found that an Australian firm had carried on trade with the islands several years before, and had been quietly trading there, all unknown to the other Pacific merchants.—Scientific American.

Spoiling the Rhine's Scenery.

On the Rhine vandalism takes the shape of extensive quarries which threaten to make the famous Siebengebirge, the most picturesque and romantic spot along the banks of the Rhine, into a shapeless mass. Not that this is the first raid which has been made on the wild beauty of the Seven Mountains. Who, of all the millions which have of recent years seen the Drachenfels from one of the Saloon boats which ply the river during summer, has not turned away in disgust from the lordly castle in glaring red brick which ironically—or impertinently rather—looks down from the wooded heights where once a terrible dragon lay in wait for human prey deep in the oak forest in a cave which is still shown as the haunt of the Wurm! As the center and one of priely landguier on the Rhine, the castle, with its overshoes turrets and golden roofs is justly admired; on the rugged heights round which countless old legends are twined, it is a real eyesore. No wonder then that petition after petition is brought before the German chamber of deputies, and that all Germany is rising up in arms against the desecration of one of its most cherished monuments of a romantic past.—Fall Mall Gazette.

The Egyptian's Cloth.

Egyptian laziness is shown in the way they have to be manufactured for the special market. They strike the hour twice in succession. For as a native very aptly said: "The first time one is generally asleep, and if one happens to be awakened by the noise one does not hear the whole number toll. To get up and see the time, or even to open the eye needlessly, is fatiguing, therefore the clock begins over again."—New York Times Book Review.

Hunting for Natural Gas.

The whole world seems to be hunting for natural gas or oil. While every town in Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, Michigan and other states either is or ought to be seriously considering the matter of securing natural gas, English capitalists are preparing to develop the oil prospects in upper Burmah, where in many places signs of oil are visible on the surface.—Detroit Tribune.

ABOUT JAPANESE NEWSPAPERS.

What They Exist for and How They Are Made Up.

Tokio alone has eleven daily and eleven weekly papers, only two of which are printed in the English language. Nagasaki has a Japanese daily and an English weekly.

Eighteen other Japanese towns support at least one daily paper each. They are all large, handsome sheets, printed on good paper, in type which even the western eye, uninstructed save by the experience of a few checks, can see is good, bold and handsome—for that kind of type. Where the type is bad I cannot say, but if the Japanese can cut the pancloes for these intricate hieroglyphics, they must be wonderfully well advanced in the mechanical arts.

Curious looking sheets they are, these Japanese papers, but they are doing a noble work, and before describing them in detail it may be well to explain their mission. They do not go in very strongly for news. Their purpose is chiefly educational. The tradition seems to survive in the navy, judging from late events, these papers, printed in their own tongue, are doing the work of gentlemen ushers to civilization, introducing the Japanese to the world at large. The columns are largely filled with translations from English and American papers and accounts of the doings of civilized people.

The truly Japanese papers have their little peculiarities. The title never goes on to a particular place, except that it must be on the last page. I fancy they generally make it on the back page, and then throw the title in anywhere on the fourth page, unless anywhere on the fourth page, unless anywhere they leave it out altogether. I am not sure of this, for I have never seen a Japanese paper made up; I only judge so from the fact that there are always three or four immense hieroglyphs of a very teachesy character rambling around these Japanese fourth pages, with a strong tendency toward the upper right hand corner, which is where, I am given to understand, the Japanese paper commences. However, I may be all wrong. These mammoth characters may only be displayed "ads" for aught I know. They occur in every paper, and all look alike.

A Japanese newspaper doesn't need a title anyhow. They are all "shimbuns." "shimbun" means "newspaper" in Japanese, and the Japanese are a plain spoken race, and believe in calling a "shimbun" a "shimbun." They venture so far as to use a qualifying word if there is more than one "shimbun" in the place, or if the "shimbun" is some particular sort of "shimbun." Thus there are mainichi (morning), nichi (daily), eri (illustrated), shimo (official) and other "shimbuns," but the last title fits them all, and this, though monotonous, is simple. You may name a "shimbun" after all the luminaries of heaven, and still it remains, in truth and in fact, only a "shimbun."

The Japanese newspapers are a little confusing to read until one gets used to them, but generally their meaning is as follows: The fourth page seems to be devoted to news items and clippings. They are a little careless about credibility, I have not been able to find a single credit line unless something happens to be taken like a cuttings in a fit and occurs frequently, means "exchange." The third page is given up to editorials and the second to a feuilleton. I am not sure of the editorials, but I am confident of the feuilleton. It has that solid four column and a half look about it, and I know the odor of utter inanity which marks the newspaper short (short! heaven save the mark) story. Double, I have a presentiment a rule. This seems to dispel the otherwise reasonable idea that it is an editorial on a subject which has thoroughly roused the editor. The first (last) page, though, is the most intelligible and interesting after all, for here are the advertisements. Here we find things familiar to us from our earliest days. The monster bottles of various patent beers and other liquids, medicinal and intoxicating; the man with two wooden legs, who, presumably, is the man with one leg who does not get his shoes of Katayama Seitaso, and others of positively decline to remember, except in the advertising columns at the regular rates.

And the gorgeous placards headed "ads" I have labored, by implication, to describe, I find, on translation, to be the body of these papers by publication of a tea chest, but as for these "ads," the tea chest "is foole to 'em."—Cor. Electrical World.

Anecdotes of Tom Marshall.

Tom Marshall was fond of saying that he and Rev. Dr. Breckinridge early in life had taken different texts. Tom's "was the bottle and Dr. Breckinridge's the Bible, and certainly," added Tom, "the reverend doctor will not deny that I have closely adhered to my text."

In the county in which the Congressional Tom officiated at the bar an erratic jurist named Judge Settle presided, and whenever Dan Rice's circus arrived the judge always announced:

"This court will now adjourn to see the elephant in the Ohio River."

In a cause celebre, where the defendant was tried for murder, defended by the Matt Ward case, the judge admitted some testimony which thoroughly shocked the sensibilities of over the barrister's objections. He jumped to his feet, not fully recovered from a big game of draw poker the night before, and said in anger:

"Judge, do you know that Pontius Pilate convicted Jesus Christ by admitting just such testimony as this?"

The judge quickly replied: "Clerk, fine Mr. Marshall $50 for contempt of court."

Tom rose, and, steadying his somewhat vibratory motions against the jury railing, addressed the judge from the jury box:

"Sir, I please your honor! It has been some months since I have seen $50 of my own money. I shall be happy to lend you the money with which to pay the fine."

The court was astonished, but, catching its judicial breath, replied sotto voce:

"Mr. Clerk, upon reflection the court is inclined to remit Tom Marshall's fine, as the state of Kentucky is better able to pay that $50 than the court is!"—Chicago Times.

DRESSING STORE WINDOWS.
Big Pay for the Man Who Does It Well. Artistic Skill Required.
Five years ago Henry Sands was a clerk employed by a small dry goods store in Sixth avenue. His salary was $12 a week, and the duties required him to be at the store each day from 7 o'clock in the morning until 8 in the evening. Fortune has smiled upon him since, and when a reporter met him on Broadway a few nights ago he was dressed in the height of fashion and wore diamonds. During the conversation that followed he revealed the cause of his success.
"You remember when I was in my old place how I used to kick whenever they told me to tidy up the show windows," he said. "Well, the very thing I objected to was the making of me. There was a fellow employed in another drygoods store a block down who was forever putting the windows of his place in shape. He made me tired. My employer was all the time after me to get ahead of him and arrange our stock in an advantageous manner. Finally I became so weary that I resigned one day to put every article he had for sale conspicuously in the show window. I did not know then that I had struck the secret of window trimming, but I know it now. I went to work with a vengeance, selected samples of every article in the store, arranged them in graceful draperies and fantastic designs so that all could be displayed, and resumed my place behind the counter, steadily nursing my employer. Before two days had passed I had reason to thank him. The representatives of a large house came to me and engaged my services to dress the window of their establ

HIS REVOLVER WAS LOADED.

A Circus Cowboy, to Swing a Stage-Coach from "Indians," Shoots Several People.

DES MOINES, Iowa, Special.—A sensation took place, Wednesday night, and the whole cowboys and Indians engaged in a show connected with the circus were supposed to attack a stage-coach, the passengers of which, had been overpowered, are on the point of being scalped, when a handful of cowboys rush on, and with rifles, weapons, steeds, and lassoes, disperse the bloodthirsty aborigines. When the pretenders dashed by the shooting became lively, and several in the audience uttered shrieks of pain and fell headlong from their seats. The performance was stopped, and it was found that several persons were fatally injured. George H. Arrington, aged 17 years, was fatally shot in the forehead, the ball having entered his brain. Mrs. A. W. Lamoreux was shot in the left side above the heart. The ball was taken from her back. She will recover. William Phillips, aged 14 years, was shot in the top of the head. The ball is embedded in the skull. One Indian was shot. It is supposed Cat a cowboy got a loaded revolver instead of one filled with blank cartridges. The Sioux Brothers are sparing no expense in making the wounded people comfortable.

THE NATIONAL GAME.

A Hot Fight for the Base-Ball Championship—Detroit and St. Louis Still Leading.

PITTSBURG STILL leads in the contest for the base-ball championship of the National League, while in the American Association Von der Ahe's St. Louis nine continues to lead the field. The following tables show the standing of the clubs in the two associations:

Death of Dorothy Dix.

DOROTHY L. DIX, who had a national reputation as a philanthropist, died at the New Jersey State Lunatic Asylum on Wednesday. She was over eighty years old, and from early life took a great interest in criminals, paupers, and the insane. She lectured all the States of the Union in their behalf, and was instrumental in founding many institutions. New Jersey gave her a home for life, and she had been at Trenton for the past five years. During the war she was superintendent of nurses in hospitals.

Killed His Neighbor with a Picket.

BENJ. BRIDWELL and Thomas J. Fry, farmers and neighbors, living on the Wabash River, twenty miles north of Palestine, Ill., quarreled over a broken wagon. Bridwell fled to stab Price with a pitchfork. Price took the fork from Bridwell, whereupon the latter attacked the former with a large dog. Bill Price picked up a fence picket and struck him over the head, killing him.

A Treasury Thief Sentenced.

OSCAR J. HARVEY, the Treasury Department forger, pleaded guilty at Washington, and was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment at hard labor. Harvey, while at the head of one of the Treasury bureaus, obtained nearly $10,000 on false claims for lost bonds. The claims were engineered through by means of forgery.

Heavy Suit Against Kalnoxyn.

JOHN GREER (colored), of Louisville, Ky., has brought suit for $20,000 damages in the United States Court at Louisville against seven citizens of Hart County, Kentucky, whom he charges with "Kalnaxing" him in July, 1886. He alleges the party took him into the woods one night and beat him severely.

Sparks from the Wires.

PRINCE PETCHONSKI is rapidly disappearing from Illinois.

ANTHONY BOLTON, the well-known ship broker of Hamburg, Germany, is dead.

The Presidential party returned to Washington Wednesday. Mr. Cleveland resumed work shortly after reaching the White House.

THE EASTERN STATES.

The Presidential party passed Friday very quietly at the residence of Mr. Cleveland, in Forest Town, N. Y. In the evening the people of the village tendered them an informal reception. The travelers left Forest Port Saturday via Watertown for Cape Vincent where they embarked on the steamer St. Lawrence for a day's ride among the Islands.

EXTENSIVE forest fires are raging in the lumber regions of Pennsylvania, in the vicinity of Brookwayville.

THE Metropolitan Storage Warehouse was destroyed by fire in New York, and a number of firemen were severely injured. St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum also took fire, and several hundred children narrowly escaped burning to death.

A UTICA (N. Y.) telegram says that an accident happened to the President's party at Sackett's Harbor, while returning from Clayton to Cape Vincent. The train was brought to a stop before the President's party became aware that there was any accident. The engineer had his hand on the whistle to blow for Stone Crossing, when the connecting bar to the forward driver on the right-hand side of the engine broke, and the huge piece of steel received with terrible velocity, tore up the iron on one side of the car and ripping the floor of the car and the ground as the engine rushed along. A huge fracture was made in the boiler, and the steam escaped in volumes. The President, when informed of the affair, said he thought there was something serious the matter when he saw the clouds of steam. Hedley, the engineer, who had saved his fireman by forcing him on top of the cab, was found lying alongside his engine dead. After instructions were given to care for the dead engineer, the President's car was attached to the express train, which had come up by this time, and was taken to Alder Creek.

AT Oil City, Pa., John McNerny killed his wife with an axe and mortally shot his son. Police went to arrest the murderer, who turned on them and fatally shot Officer George Barr. Officer Weston then shot McNerny, who will die.

The President and Mrs. Cleveland spent Tuesday last at Fayetteville, N. Y., the former's boyhood home. At the residence of Mrs. Hoyt a reception was held, which gave the people of the village an opportunity of meeting them. H. H. Edwards, a classmate of the President in his boyhood, made a short address of welcome, and the latter made a brief response, during which he said:

I remember Green Lake and the fish I tried years ago, and I remember the bass. I suppose are there to-day. Yes, sir, I remember the bass. I used to catch them in the shore, and how scared I was. But I have heard so much talk about bass that two years that I do not think the bass story will frighten me now. I have some of the old residents of Fayetteville here. I recall some of them. I have not mention this thing as other I have been accused of because I have taken off my coat. I seem to be almost at home. I remember my first rollicking days in Fayetteville, and those, with all I brought back of religious and moral training, I carried with me through every station of life. It is a pleasure to be in Fayetteville and those days so short ago. I can see the old schoolhouse, the Seminary, and the mind dwells upon the happy days and the old friends of those days. You are a part of the old environment. I am glad to be back. I ask that you keep an eye on me. I shall be grateful for your advice and for the appreciation of the people of Fayetteville, my oldest and best friends.

THE WESTERN STATES.

THE town of Nogales, Arizona, was badly damaged by a cloud-burst. In Sonora, Mexico, a few miles distant, a number of houses were washed away and one child drowned.

THE case of Chris Von der Ahe, President of the St. Louis Base Ball Club, charged with violating the Sunday law by staging a game of base-ball on Sunday, was called in the Court of Criminal Correction in St. Louis on Saturday. The courtroom was filled, and many people had to stand. Judge Noonan discharged the defendant after hearing the evidence. It said that the Missouri Supreme Court, in the case of the citizens of Sunday law, had not prohibited, either expressly or constructively, base-ball, if carried on decently, orderly, and quietly. In conclusion, he said: "I may say in addition to this that the game was a reasonable sport and the use of such property. I have no doubt of the fact that money was taken and money paid for the privilege of witnessing the game within the meaning of the statute and since there was no charge of any pass-player or singer that attracted the crowd to the ground, the day to contribute to his entertainment."

THE steamer City of Mackinaw ran over a row-boat near Detroit, and Christopher Nicolas and Jacob Bohler, with their wives, were drowned.

MAYOR FRANCIS, of St. Louis, has appointed a committee composed of twenty prominent citizens to invite President Cleveland to visit that city during the Exposition.

FIRE at Coldwater, Mich., destroyed property to the value of $100,000. Loss, half a $50,000 fire; Manistee, Ill., a $17,000 fire, and Fond du Lac, Wis., had a big blaze.

AFTER a race at Peoria, Ill., Glen Miller, a trotting stallion, was given a drink of ice water, which killed him in his death. He had a record of 2:18, and was valued at $10,000.

FRIGHTENED by a runaway team, a boy of about 12 years, of Fort Wayne, Ind., was killed by being thrown under the wheels of a street car. The boy's name could not be learned.

THE Chicago Board of Trade reports 19,000,000 bushels of wheat, 2,160,625 bushels of corn, 678,580 bushels of oats, 41,152 bushels of rye, and 12,000 bushels of barley; total, 13,904,000 bushels of all kinds of grain, against 10,028,000 bushels a year ago.

A COMPLETE census of the mortality in Chicago caused by the lately ended hot weather will probably never be made, says a dispatch from that city. The full story of the sudden taking off by death of so many is not fully detailed by it can never be told. It is doubtful if the citizens realize yet what a calamity it was, and how dreadful the results. The coroner's office, with their long list of certificates, can show nothing of a sudden death, and a look into the morgue, where bodies lie piled like cordwood, where bodies lie piled like cordwood, waiting until official action will permit their burial, bear witness to the terrible effect of the last plague. With a few exceptions it has been possible to gather the list of those whose death is directly attributable to unusually hot weather, and who were attacked, and who more or less narrowly escaped dissolution, cannot be known. How many there were who died, and whose death was attributed to other causes than prostration, but who would probably have recovered from their existing ailments had it not been for the prostration caused by the intense heat, will always remain a conundrum. Not putting aside all those cases of heatstroke reported up to Monday morning, and concerning on the three previous days:

Total	1,011
Dying	37
Will recover	10
Total	1,058

Never before in the history of Chicago has there been so much work for the Coroner—not excepting the time of the great fire or any of the fire epidemics with which the city has been visited.

AT Nelson, X.-h., a farmer named Conrad was taken from jail and lynched by a mob. Conrad had been arrested for the murder and robbery of another farmer named Henry Sabin.

A MINNEAPOLIS dispatch says the St. Anthony Elevator, capacity 1,000,000 bushels, burned, caught fire on Tuesday and was destroyed with its contents, about 1,100,000 bushels of wheat. The elevator was a triple structure, connected by tramways, and had a capacity of 3,500,000 bushels. The loss on buildings and machinery is $250,000 and the loss on grain $825,000. The elevator was the largest in the Northwest, and was one of the large elevators of Minneapolis capitalists.

THE SOUTHERN STATES.

THE production of sugarcane in the South this year will fall below the output of last year.

A COLUMBIA (S. C.) special says: "Mary Cherry, an 11-year-old colored girl of Barnwell, has been convicted of the murder of her little white charge, and was sentenced to be hanged in September. The younger criminal was hired out by her parents to nurse a white baby. The work was distasteful to her and she also mistered a dose of concentrated lye."

A RICHMOND (Va.) dispatch announces the death of Robert M. T. Hunter, who was one of Virginia's most prominent citizens before and during the late war. He was born in 1809. He served several terms in the National House of Representatives, being elected Speaker of that body in 1839. Subsequently he was elected United States Senator and made Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee in 1849, which position he held till the opening of the war. He gave Douglas a close run for the Presidential nomination at the National Democratic Convention at Charleston in 1860. During the war he served as Confederate Secretary of State and Confederate Senator. He was also a member of the Peace Commission which met Abraham Lincoln in Hampton Roads. After the war he was elected Treasurer of Virginia, holding that office for several terms, after which he retired to private life.

THE NATIONAL CAPITAL.

THE Washington papers say there are more cranks now in Washington than at any other time.

A DECISION has just been rendered in the case of James Young, a homestead entry man of Salt Lake City, Utah, which confirms the action of the Land Department that cultivation and improvements and the showing of good faith in other respects will not compensate for lack of actual residence upon the land sought to be procured.

THE INDUSTRIAL REALM.

T. V. POWDERLY prints the following in the Journal of United Labor, issued last Saturday, in reference to the resolution in a number of newspaper that the organization of the Knights of Labor was breaking up:

We are breaking up to be sure, we are breaking up to call for the working of more energy in the cause of labor, we are breaking up to lay the foundation for a more vigorous and lasting work, we are breaking up the idea that the Knights of Labor is a secret society, we are breaking up the idea that a few men may hold millions of men in the palm of their hand, we are breaking up fear of monopoly and dynamite, we are breaking up the belief that we are a class, we are breaking up the belief that we are a political party, we are breaking up that breeding cause of prejudice, we are breaking up the idea that we are breaking up, we are breaking up the idea of civilizing refinement, we are breaking up the belief that we are a mob, we are breaking up the belief that we are a party of disorder, we are breaking up the belief that we are a party of anarchy, we are breaking up the belief that we are a party of sex rule, we are breaking up the belief that we are a party of institutional rights, we are breaking up the belief that we are a party of the women one-third the wages paid men, we are breaking up the belief that we are breaking up the idea that we are breaking up the belief that we are breaking up the belief that we are breaking up ignorance, intemperance, crime, poverty and want, we are breaking up the idea wherever found. Yes, the Knights of Labor are breaking up, breaking up the unforeseen, unprecedented, unexpected, and while they may not be the same organization that they started in the evolution of moral forces that are working out the salvation of man.

It is stated that plans for the organization of a company to build a railway from Rio Janeiro to Buenos Ayres, which city expects to be pleased at the announcement that it is about to be served by other cities.

THE POLITICAL FIELD.

THE Prohibition State Convention at Des Moines, Iowa, Thursday, was composed of eighteen delegates, a full quorum. Ex-Governor Q. O. Farnham, of Plymouth County, was chosen for Governor. The platform contains a long arraignment of dealing with the liquor traffic; advocates more stringent laws; favors a reduction of passenger rates to two cents a mile; approves woman suffrage; favors the establishment of postal savings banks.

A DEPARTAT from Huron, Dakota, says the Union and Admission Convention, which has just adjourned, was remarkable for the harmony between Republicans and Democrats since being enthusiastic. It is certain that the demand is being pushed more vigorously than ever before." Messrs. Mellette, McDonald, Plummer, McCoy, Pettigrew and others are mentioned in with North Dakota. The following is a synopsis of the resolutions adopted:

We are unalterably opposed to admission as one State, and we demand admission at once with standard parallel, the convention affirms that it is the duty of the Dakotas, acting with the Union to designate their States by distinctive names, and we request our Congress with their joint action and request, without regard to the question in accordance with a plan to be submitted by the people of the Dakotas, we protest against the tyranny of Congress in the attempt to impose upon the people of the Dakotas the support of a system of schools that are not in harmony with those of others; we commend the President and secretary of the Interior to receive the thanks of the people for the adoption of the measures providing for the speedy settlement of the Dakotas.

JUDGE THURMAN has written a letter to Senator Gorman, in which he urges the Democratic nomination for Governor of Ohio, and asking his friends to do everything in their power to secure the nomination. At a Democratic Senatorial convention at Steubenville, Senator Gorman was unanimously indorsed for Governor, Cleveland, and Mr. Thurman for Governor.

THE New York Herald prints a two-column interview with Henry Waterson on politics in general. Mr. Waterson says the Democrats have made some mistakes in their tariff legislation, but they have not, as there is no one to contest the fact with him. He is for Cleveland, and says:

"Well, as the old lady said to her husband, 'Husband, I may say—' or, 'Husband, I may say—' I begin to get nothing right here.

He is also quoted as saying:

"At one time I thought the Republicans would rally to the support of the Democratic party, however, point to the reminiscences of Mr. Blaine. In his heart he was for free trade, but he was with some material variations. What will some variations and spoil some personal scandal and calumny. The Mulligan business pretty near knocked Blaine out, the latter less so. Another thing that knocked the Presidency out of Blaine was knocked Maria Haigin as high as a kite. Real horses are gathering with the Democratic party clearness. The tariff for revenue only and free trade is the issue. The tariff issue of the controversy with greater ability and capability than all the others put together. The solid South for another thing and as a fine, the Republicans are going to make an indictment which, though specious, will serve their purpose. I think one more campaign, anyhow, can such insertions stand? Can such a cause fail to produce a great deal of feeling."

THE FOREIGN BUDGET.

FATHER O'BRIEN, in addressing the County Kerry Grand Jury, admitted there was a decrease of crimes in that section of Ireland, but the cause was the moral extinguisher of the rascally members of the community to a lawless organization.

ALEXANDER KEURY, the well-known German metal founder, is dead. Keury came to America from Zwolle in 1852, and has been all his life identified with the celebrated Essen manufactory established by his father in 1825, which has grown from a limited establishment to its present colossal proportions under Herr Friedrich's supervision. In 1864 the King of Prussia offered him letters of nobility, which he declined to accept.

THE CONTINENT AT LARGE.

THE Signal Service weather and crop bulletin for the week ending July 16 estimates that corn has sustained some injury by reason of the protracted drought and excessive heat.

In an interview with a New York Herald representative Mr. Spreckels declared that he would not sign the new Hawaiian Constitution unless compelled to.

A excursion train on the London and Port Stanley Railway was run into at St. Thomas, Ont., by a Canada Southern freight train. The week took fire, and probably a dozen persons were burned to death. Intelligence from the wreck up to the hour of our paper, A 8 St. Thomas dispatch gives the following particulars of the disaster:

The freight train was made up of a number of cattle cars, and was being run from London into one of those cars, when, without any warning, the train came into the terrible conflagration. Fire engines were sent for from London and St. Thomas, and Griffin's warehouse, coal and lime yards, Talbot street, Lawrence's, Ross, and John Campbell's dwelling on Wellington street were all destroyed to the ground, with their contents. Engines were sent to the wreck. Fire was thrown from the burning cars into the adjoining lumber yard, and the whole place was in flames. Fire Chief Wilson, with his men, made frantic efforts to escape, and with difficulty succeeded in getting out safely. Standing in front of the burning building, he saw a number of men in their rooms, a number of lives were lost, but how many cannot be known. At 8 o'clock, when thousands of people were assembled, there was a sudden rush of the oil tanks on the east side of the yard, and some of them fell to the ground with great force, and perhaps fatally, injuring many. Already nine bodies have been taken out, and others were burned to pieces.

Dispatches from Kingstown says that Saturday and Sunday last were by all odds the two hottest days in the history of that city. The temperature rose to 102, and hundreds of people were prostrated by the intense heat. The oldest inhabitant never knew such a hot spell, whether he lived in Quebec or Chicago the heat was even more fearful. At Belle River the temperature reported to have stood at 107, while at Sarnia, Ill., it hung between the 100 degree mark and the 110 degree mark. The mercury rose to 102 in Toronto, and at Stratford

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

Gov. Luce has appointed T. Daily Mower, chief of police of East Saginaw, as the Michigan delegate to the 14th National conference of corrections and charities, which meets in Omaha on Aug. 25.

The first printing press in Michigan was brought from Baltimore by Rev. Gabriel Richards, A printing office was fitted up at Detroit, and a weekly newspaper, called the "The Michigan Essay or Impartial Observer" was started in 1809. The price of the paper was $5 a year. So far as can be ascertained, it perished after an existence of one week.—Grand Rapids Democrat.

Brother Clark of the Harbor Springs Republican, has secured a pension. Strange, isn't it that Mr. Clark could not procure the full measure of justice under a republican administration, but was obliged to wait the advent of democratic administration. Mr Clark no doubt deserved a pension and we are glad he has obtained it, but he should at least have the manhood to admit the possibility of obtaining a pension under democratic authority.—Petoskey Democrat.

The opposition organs are strenuously endeavoring to convince the democrats that the "battle flag order" has rendered it impossible for them to re-elect President Cleveland, and that his nomination would consequently be "another democratic blunder." This is remarkably kind and considerate of the opposition organs, of course, but it must discourage them to see that their well-meant warnings produce so little effect on the stupid, blundering democrats. The latter do not even think of looking beyond Mr. Cleveland for a candidate. They appear to be entirely satisfied with him, and as the republicans say they are satisfied that he can't be re-elected they ought to be satisfied with the situation. The unselfishness which prompts the republicans to warn their opponents against the danger to them of a mis step that they seem bent on making is a pleasing manifestation of disinterestedness in politics, and goes to prove that the "grand old party" has not survived its generous impulses.

A "country merchant" publishes the following excellent suggestions in a late number of the Michigan Tradesman:—If the merchant doing business in a country town responds at all liberally to the calls made on him for charity, public improvements, religious matters, celebrations, and the numerous other objects which geminate the subscription paper, it will make a serious inroad into his income. No matter how seriously he may be troubled about financial difficulties that are invisible to the general public, there are certain demands upon him which policy and custom dictate that he must meet, and meet according to the evidences of his ostensible prosperity. And here I think a wrong policy is pursued by many embarrassed tradesmen. If Muggins allows himself on the verge of failure, and the Rev. Mr. Slimmer informs him that he has been assessed $100 toward giving young Toots a Yale course in theology, but paddling, etc. Muggins should have the moral courage to refuse stock in the Toots scheme, and save the money for his creditors; and if Snooks' peanut emporium hardly pays his living expenses he is absurdly foolish in subscribing a week's profits, to replace the team that Boozer lost by lightning, because Boozer buys a nickle cigar of him once or twice a week."

The Quality of Tobacco.

In conversation with one of the principal cigar dealers in the city the other day I learned several things which occasioned me no little surprise. My informant, who is a man of close observation, told me that there was a very general tendency among smokers to economize. Those who used to pay twenty-five cents apiece for their cigars now purchased two for that sum and those who used to be contented to get two for a quarter now wanted three. He explained that it was not by any means on account of an improvement in the quality of tobacco used that this change had been brought about. On the contrary, he said the recollection had the crop of the weed been of a poorer nature than during the past four or five years.

"Why," he said, "I can remember well the time when I sold a better cigar for ten cents than I now sell for a quarter. That was not before the war either. In ante bellum days these good, really good, cigars were retailed for ten cents."

"How about pipe smoking?"

"It is in running all the time. Until a few years ago it was not worth my while to keep pipes in stock—nobody wanted them. Now, you see I have a fair assortment. I suppose the habit comes from the other side. Pipe smoking in the street as well as the house is the rule and not the exception. There is not much money in the trade yet, still has to the selling of cigarettes."—Brooklyn Eagle.

A Southern Yankee City.

Birmingham has just two characteristics of the southern town—wide streets and wooden awnings over the sidewalks. Itself, and in spectacle as a Yankee—and beyond. There is the bustle of New York on her main streets, the push of Chicago in doing business. Everybody is on the move, including even the colored man. If he finds a place here to sit in the sun and sleep somebody will soon walk all over him, without dreaming an apology necessary. On the street or in the hotel office you find the Yankee, the southerner, the Jew, Englishman, German, Italian, Frenchman and Mongolian, and all are looking in one direction—after the mighty dollar. While the southerner was doubtless here first, he seems invited his Yankee friend to come down with his long pocketbook, and it was well for both that the invitation was not refused. The latter has been more money made in real estate in Birmingham in the last five years than in any speculation of whatever nature, north or south.

Though I call it a southern Yankee city let me do the southerner full justice. He has here an honest hand and I believe he will purge himself of the lazy, enterprise and perseverance of the legend Yankee. He has invested and reinvested. He has built and rebuilt. He made the town. He controls its local affairs. He exhibits all the push and energy that can be demanded, even amid great pain, possessed by a half Yankee. The young southerner has even to the front in Birmingham as somewhere else in the south, and by his public enterprise and business sagacity has shown the world what is in him. Birmingham is a young man's town. It will continue to be so for all time to come. He has grown up around the new order of things and he had to begin barehanded and to fight the people of a hundred years. He has done nobly well—no one could have done better.—Detroit Free Press.

The Railroad Conductor's Corns.

A funny story came under the observation of a reporter the other day. He was talking to Conductor Fitzsimon, when the latter pulled off a shoe, pared and made a railroad note in his memorandum book. This book and the pencil used by Mr. Fitzsimon brought up the subject of corns in a peculiar way. It was sharpened with a four-inch pencil instead of being round.

"What's that for?" asked the reporter.

"Oh, nothing; just a freak of mine. But look at that finger."

"What's the matter with the finger?"

"Don't you see that corn?"

"Well, how did it come there?"

"By writing on the train."

"I don't have any corns on my fingers," suggested the reporter.

"You don't have to. You see, writing on the train while in motion is no easy job, and to write at all intelligibly you have to grip the pencil so tight, as a vise. Nearly all of us have these corns."

The conductor's right middle finger, on the left side, had a thick, flat, hard corn on it, exactly like one caused from a tight shoe.—Atlanta Constitution.

Value of the Eucalyptus.

The eucalyptus tree grows in the greatest luxuriance on the coast of Lower California, and wherever it abounds the climate is found to be reasonable. The whole region in the vicinity of Santa Barbara is its natural soil, and the valleys are filled with its spicy groves. Its leaves are very peculiar, and ready to burn as soon as they fall, invaluable as a spicy sweet. They are gathered by the dwellers of the coast towns, and used for kindling. Hie we use pine shavings here.—Globe-Democrat.

A Preacher's Quotation.

"As regards my sermons," said Dr. Robinson, "I have no stock—no inspiration. Sometimes I select my subjects from a conversation. I have taken an idea from a newspaper editorial. I get my texts from a Bible bought for the purpose, and paste them on a sheet of paper. I have a bad memory for quotations, and this system fortifies me against errors."—New York World.

Sore Eyes

The eyes are always in sympathy with the body, and afford an excellent index of its condition. When the eyes become weak, and the lids inflamed and sore, it is an evidence that the system has become disordered by scrofula, for which Ayer's Sarsaparilla is the best known remedy.

Scrofula, which produced a painful inflammation in my eyes, caused me much suffering for a number of years. By the advice of a physician I commenced taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. After using this medicine a short time I was completely

Cured

My eyes are now in a splendid condition, and I am as well and strong as ever.—Mrs. William Gage, Concord, N. H.

For a number of years I was troubled with a humor in my eyes, and was unable to obtain any relief until I commenced using Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has effected a complete cure, and I believe it to be the best of blood purifiers.—C. E. Upton, Nashua, N. H.

From childhood, and until within a few months, I have been afflicted with Weak and Sore Eyes. I have used for these complaints, with beneficial results, Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and consider it a great blood purifier.—Mrs. C. Phillips, Clover, Vt.

I suffered for a year with inflammation in my left eye. Three ulcers formed on the ball, depriving me of sight, and causing great pain, pronounced by other remedies, to no purpose. I was finally induced to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and, three bottles of this medicine, have been entirely cured. My sight has been restored, and there is no sign of inflammation, sore, or ulcer in my eye.—Kendal T. Bowen, Super Tree Hedge, Ohio.

By Taking

My daughter, for years old, was afflicted with Scrofulous Sore Eyes. During the last two years she never saw light of any kind. Physicians of the highest standing exerted their skill, but with no permanent success. On the recommendation of a friend I purchased a bottle of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which my daughter commenced taking. Before the had used the third bottle her sight was restored, and she can now look steadily at a brilliant light without pain. Her cure is complete.—Mrs. E. Sutherland, Evangelist, Bowling City, Ky.

TEN YEARS AGO, on December 26th, 1875, The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS was founded. It was the pioneer of low-priced journalism in the west. From the first the controlling conviction of its managers has been that a "cheap paper" should be cheap only in price; that its news should be as fresh and complete, its editorial discussion as able, and its general tone and character as pure and healthful as its best and highest-priced contemporary. This has been its ideal. How well it has succeeded in the actual maintenance of so high a standard is best evidenced in the fact that it now regularly prints and sells over 150,000 papers a day,—a larger circulation than that of all other Chicago dailies combined.

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is an INDEPENDENT newspaper. It is not partisan. Neither is it a neutral. It is a paper of positive opinion, expressed without fear or favor. It seeks the patronage of people who love country more than party.

The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is the only 2 cent paper in the west that is a member of the Associated Press. It prints ALL THE NEWS.

Sold by all news dealers at two cents per copy. Mailed to any address, postage prepaid, for six dollars per year, or for a shorter term at rate of fifty cents per month. Address THE DAILY NEWS, 123 Fifth Ave., CHICAGO, ILL.

After living in this county ten years he returned to his former home in New York state.

Coming Events

The Loyal Legion will meet at M. E. Church next Saturday afternoon at 3 o'clock.

Rev. Mr. Downs, of Cadillac, will preach at the Congregational church next Sunday morning, and at Ironton at 3 p. m.

The Congregational church has arrangements for the Rev. C. F. Van Auken to conduct a series of evangelistic services in September.

A weight social will be held at the home of J. A. Johnson in Marion tomorrow (Friday) evening for the benefit of their pastor. Ice cream and cake will be served.

The ladies of the M. E. church will give an ice-cream social in the parsonage yard, Monday evening Aug. 8, if the weather is pleasant. If not, the social will be held in the church. All are cordially invited.

The pastor of the M. E. church calls attention to the prayer meeting this evening, the teachers meeting Friday evening. Sunday morning service will be led by the pastor. Candidates for baptism are requested to be present.

Divine service, with sermon and holy communion at 10.30 o'clock, a. m.; also service, sermon, and baptism, at 3 o'clock, p. m., on Sunday next, by Rev. J. U. Rippey, D. D., of Detroit. You will not be disappointed if you expect to be interested. Come and see.

The Railroad Assured.

The committee recently appointed by the directors of the Detroit, Charlevoix and Escanaba railroad company to visit New York in the interest of that company have returned, having consummated arrangements by which the D. C. & E. will form an extension of the Toledo, Ann Arbor and Northern railroad. The T. A. A. & N. is now completed to Ft. Pleasant and is being pushed from that place to Kalkaska where it will connect with the D. C. & E. Work between Charlevoix and Kalkaska will begin as soon as contracts can be made for clearing and grading. If practical, the route will probably be extended to Mackinaw City, thus placing Charlevoix not on a branch or spur, but on a main line, giving us direct connection with the east as well as the west.

Spend the Good News, and let everyone know the benefits to be derived from the use of Parmelee's Blood Purifier. It thoroughly cleanses the system from all humors. It is a sure cure for scrofula, erysipelas, chronic sores, tumors, salt rheum, and all diseases indicating an impure condition of the blood. Price $1.00 per bottle. Sold by G. W. Crouter. 2lt

Base Ball.

Last Thursday afternoon, the boys (over fifty) of the resorts, met on the diamond in manly combat, that lasted one hour and a half. At the close of the contest, the score stood 18 and 17 in favor of the Chicago resort.

On last Friday and Saturday Charlevoix played at Cheboygan and did themselves proud by defeating their twice on their own grounds. The batteries on Friday were Vogel and Klock for Charlevoix, and Wheaton and McGinly for Cheboygan; on Saturday Burnett pitched the first six innings for Charlevoix and then gave way to Graham; Kraft caught them. Glenn Allen umpired both games with satisfaction to all of the players.

Friday's score by innings:

Innings.....	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10
Charlevoix.....	0	0	7	0	0	1	2	1	0	1	10
Cheboygan.....	0	2	2	0	1	2	2	0	2	0	11

Saturday's score by innings:

Innings.....	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Cheboygan.....	0	1	0	2	1	0	0	0	1	5

Monday and Tuesday Kalkaska played Charlevoix on this home ground, and the boys dropped the first game of the season. They were nearly all sick, and did not do as good playing as they are capable of. Johns, of the Charlevoix, made two beautiful catches of hot liners; his playing and Connor's home run were the features of the game. Vogel and Klock were the battery for Charlevoix until the middle of the sixth inning when Vogel threw his arm out of joint at the elbow, and was obliged to retire from the box; Graham took his place. The score stood 7 to 7 when filled the points for Kalkaska. Below is the score by innings.

Umpire, Darby.

The second game between Kalkaska and Charlevoix played Tuesday was by all odds the best exhibition in the national game played on the home ground this season. The home team played all around Kalkaska, so that after the first inning out of the ten played, Kalkaska only made three tallies. With the exception of the umpire, of course, all present admitted that Charlevoix won the game. Darby, of Kalkaska was umpire, and he is wholly unfit for that position. He is lame, and physically unable to adjust himself to the diamond so as to see a close play. Then he is too dishonest to grant a decision against his own team. It was currently reported, and admitted by at least one Kalkaska man, that Darby had a wager on the result of the game. In the first inning Charlevoix was obliged to get five runs out before he could call the side out. The Kalkaska players are gentlemen and some of them frequently remonstrated with the umpire for his unjust rulings.

Burnett and Kraft filled the points for Charlevoix, and Connor and Donovan for Kalkaska.

The official score is as follows:

The Charlevoix Album.

Dr. G. W. Crouter has had prepared, and will have for the exclusive sale of, a series of 26 fine photographic views in album form, showing to good advantage the beauties of Charlevoix and vicinity, which should find a ready sale among tourists and those of our citizens who have in mind the future welfare of our town. The principal view is of Round lake and the town from the top of the Chicago club house, and both resorts as well as the principal public buildings and streets can be seen in for their share of attention. The whole makes a very pretty and appropriate present for lady or gentleman, and is sold for only 50 cents. It will be well to purchase at once, before the supply is exhausted.

An Open Letter.

Having opened my Cigar Factory in this village, and being supplied with a fine line of Leaf Tobacco, I am now ready to furnish the trade with a line of goods unsurpassed by any in Michigan. I have had a long and practical experience in the manufacture of Cigars, and shall challenge competition on all grades of goods. Trading I shall receive a liberal share of the public patronage. I remain,

Very respectfully,

F. D. PHILLIPS.

My go

SALOA EL SOL.

BY FRED LUCCA SQUIRES.

"If the sun care to rise, let him rise,
And if not let him ever lie risk;
For the light from my lady-love's eyes
Shines forth as the sun never dies."

If the moon care to shine, let her shine,
But her glimmer is duller by far
Than a pair of such eyes which in mine—
Of a face which beams bright as a star!

If the forest glades glitter in light,
Let the birds come out from their lair to call;
I would leave the lower for lower, I would
Thee, I'e surpassed by my lady-love tall.

If the world care to charm, let it try—
Let the dreams come again and go;
And, too soon, with it fast fast out,
But dwell, will, enthralled, worship thee!

"Saloa el Sol, at ha do salir,
Y si no, que nunca salga;
Que para alumbrarme a mi,
Ya tiene la tua ojos basta."

"BETSY GAMP'S WEDDIN."

BY M. J. ROY.

"Fix up, old woman, fix up, put on yer best bib and tucker, for we're goin to a shake down ter night."

"Ole man, shet up, yer must be crazy."

"No, I'm not, its nigh onto thirty years since I shook my foot, but its got ter trip it ter night, even if it does make my jints crack."

"What ye mean, Jonathan?"

"I mean that there gown'o be a shake down at Pete Stumps." And the old man waved his hat over his head while he waltzed about the kitchen. Aunt Tilda Knickleboss sat with a pan of apples on her lap, gazing at her husband in astonishment, while the knife she had halted and hissed on the stone.

"I'm goin' ter be thar an' shake my foot, the first time in thirty years," added Uncle Jonathan, continuing to waltz about the kitchen.

"Jonathan Knickleboss, hev ye lost yer senses?"

"No."

"Set down then an' tell me what yer mean."

Uncle Johnathan was soon out of breath, and gladly enough threw himself into a kitchen chair.

"Well, Tilda—"

"Well, Jonathan, what d'yer mean?"

"Thar's goin' ter be a shake-down at Pete Stumps, all on account o some uns comin' back from California, an' yer can guess who it is?"

"No, o' course not; who is it?"

"Hamp Flatsnarb."

"Who's he?"

"What! don't yer remember Hamp, the forty-niner, who went away so long ago?"

"Pears to me like I do remember him a little, said Aunt Tilda, resuming the paring of her apples.

"O' course ye remember Hamp. Why, he was a leetle boy when we war sparkin'.

"Yes, I remember him now."

"Well, we'll go to the shake down, fur it's given in honor o' him."

"But ye furgit, Jonathan; we both be long to the church now."

"Oh, I don't keer if we do. The Bible says there's a time to dance, an that time when Hamp Flatsnarb comes home."

"Jonathan, I don't believe ye ought to go," said Aunt Tilda, yet evincing in her tone just the least inclination to yield.

"Yer don't? Well, I do. Hamp's come home arter been gone nigh onto twenty years, an' we'll go; course we will, ole woman, meetin' or no meetin'; so, fix up, put on yer best bib an' tucker. Why, I knowed Hamp ever since he war knee high. He's not on my lap many a time.

"Who all's goin' to be thar?"

"Oh, everybody. Thar's the Moores, the Perkinses, the Williamses, the Snyders, Lungs, Brown, Smiths, Inskeeses, Allens, Noddingtons, Applegates, Pendergests, Mitchells, Thrashers, Hamilltons, Pickertons, and Betsy Gamp the school marm.

"Is Betsy Gamp goin?"

"Yes."

"Sure?"

"Dead sartin'. Little Alph Lowe overheard Ben Hamilton tell Nick Alread that Sam Snyder had heard her say she was goin', so thar can be any doubt av it."

"Why Jonathan, I declar ye've put me all in a flutter."

"O course; git ready, we're goin."

"Will our children be thar?"

"O' course, Tom, Sally, Dave, and Ned all airer—"

"Well, Jonathan, we'd look like two old fools a dancin afore our grown up children."

"We mouldn't dance of we don't want to. Yer see thar's goin' ter be a big supper like a barbecue. Pete's axed the whole country round, so they kin all git ter see Hamp at once."

"Are ye sure Betsy's goin'?"

"Course she is.

"I didn't she use ter know Hamp?"

"Guess she did, ole woman. She was a pretty leetle gal o' sixteen when he went away in forty-nine."

"Pore Betsy. She's a good gal," said Aunt Tilda, peeling apples vigorously, as if she was in a hurry to get dinner ready.

"Yes, Betsy is a fine gal. She's teachin' our skoole right ter twelve years now, an' she's a lady in all Sian Circle neighborhood. It's Betsy Gamp. Guess she's a sho shorty on everything.

"Say, Jonathan, don't it seem kinder strange for you an Betsy never got married?"

"Yes, a leetle."

"An' she's had so many good chances, too. They was Abel Balloo was a good kitch, an' she let him go by; then Phil Nicholls came next, but he took to drink, and no gal as sensible as Betsy'd ever marry a man wot drinks. They sence she's been on the old maid list, Deakin Smart, whose wife died, 'a a most ded arter her."

"Well, ole woman, I spose she don't want ter marry. I guess that's all that be about it."

"She's a good gal an' could get anybody she wanted."

Aunt Tilda had now completed peeling her apples, and proceeded to prepare the dinner.

Evening came and all the country was in a bustle. It seemed as if the entire neighborhood had suddenly concluded to go to Pete Stump's. The large, roomy, old-fashioned country house of Pete Stump, with its heavy oak doors and solid oak floors and broad fire-places, was crowded to its utmost capacity.

To one Uncle Jonathan's expression, everybody was there.

"Come in, come in, how dy do? This is Hamp Flatsnarb. I guess ye know him though; don't look much like ye left the smitch," said Peter Stump who stood at the front door. At his side was a tall, broad-shouldered man, with heavy mustache, and face bronzed by long exposure to wind and weather.

He was probably forty years of age, his hair once dark was now streaked with gray, and the heavy mustache was also growing a little frosty with time.

Many of the old people in the neighborhood who had known Hamp Flatsnarb as a quick, impulsive youth, now looked to see if there were any familiar features about his face.

"Yes, he is just the same," they all whispered, "except that dark scar in his cheek where he got the lasso scar ye got in old Sally Flint.

"Ah, Hamp, I'm so glad ter see ye back agin!" said Uncle Jonathan Knickleboss, grasping his hand. "It's been ages an ages ago since yer left here a young man. Ye war workin' for me then. I reckin ye remember it. We use ter work all day, an' hunt coons at night.

"Yes, I, I remember it, ole boss," said Hamp with that peculiar Western dialect whose sounds so harsh to cultured ears.

"Ye left so suddin, Hamp. What made ye do it? I went ter bed expectin' ver back next mornin an' lo an' behold, ver did not come, an I found out afterward that ye'd put out for California."

"Yes, went suddenly."

"Struck it rich, I hear?"

"Pretty good lead.

"Did ye bring it. I want ter see ye, an' talk wit ye over it all after awhile, when I get time."

"I'll do it, ole boss."

He had always been a very quiet man, and it was not strange that he should seem so silent on this evening.

"Say, Jonathan, ar' the boys lookin arter yer horses?" asked Mr. Stump.

"Yes, Pete; they've got hout all thes kin do, though, for there's fourt twenty or thirty teams thar ter look arter, an more a-comin."

The roads seemed alive with horsemen and people in wagons, all coming to Pete Stump's.

"Tilda, he looks kinder sad, don't he?" said Jonathan, as he sat by his wife in the big sitting-room, watching the face of the man who had left the neighborhood a pauper so many years ago and returned a millionaire.

"Years' me he looks kinder disappointed like," said Aunt Tilda, gazing at the face for a long time through her glasses.

"Disappointed—why should he be disappointed, ole woman; don't ye know he's a millionaire now? He's got all the money he kin possibly want, an' mon'e he'd ever spend. Guess he kin enjoy himself somer

"But look at him! He sighs, Jonathan, an' looks sorrowful. Oh, Jonathan, money can't allers make people happy.

"I guess it kin make me a most pow'ful happy jest now."

At this moment supper was announced, and the older folks were hurried off to the great old-fashioned country dining-room, where the table fairly groaned beneath its load of good things. Country delicacies are always nicer and fresher than can be found anywhere in city hotels. The vegetables grow in their season and have all the fresh and fine flavor nature intended—have not the stale, flat taste of premature hot-house development of the wilted vegetables found in cities.

Uncle Jonathan was placed at the head of the table, so he could carve the turkey, his wife on his right, and Hamp Flatsnarb, whom they insisted should sit at the first table, on its left.

Musicians were scraping their violins, getting ready for the "shake down" as soon as supper should be over.

The younger people, who were to come in at the second table, were in the great sitting-room chatting and laughing as only youngsters can.

"I say, Tilda, hev ye seen anything o' Betsy this evening? Uncle Jonathan asked.

"Why! Wot did ye say?" asked the returned Californian, starting up as if from a reverie.

"Betsy Gamp; she was to a been here."

"She was—"

"Ye heerd she war comin'."

"She'll be here yet," said Aunt Tilda.

"I've reckon she will! Ye reckon she will, Aunt Tilda?" There was a depth of tender eagerness about the question which greatly intensified the fire in the dark gray eyes.

"Oh, yes, she'll come, I'll be bound."

Hamp Hamp seemed to recover his self-possession, and sank into his usual reserve manner. If some powerful emotions were raging within that heart, they were hidden by an armor of steel, and were known only to himself.

The California millionaire finished his supper, and then went into the sitting-room, where he took his broad-brimmed hat from the peg on the wall, and slipped it low over his eyes, sat down, apparently oblivious to all his surroundings.

A little bustle at the door announced a new arrival, and some one said:

"She's come at last.

The forty-niner looked up from under his broad brim and his eye instantly blazed with a new light. He started to his feet—but checked himself as he remembered Betsy was, and sat down again. The new arrival was a little woman with large blue eyes and a profusion of goldenhair. She was past thirty, and the combined influence of time and care had left some wrinkles on her face—though there was no little beauty remaining. She was large-hearted, neighborhood schoolmarm.

Betsy was hurried off to supper, while the tall man in whose honor the entertainment was given sat swearing at his ill-luck.

She returned and was then presented to him.

"Betsy? Course I know her," cried Hamp, starting up and seizing one small hand in both of his. "Why, it seems an age since I set eyes on her, but I know ye yit mong a thousand."

Betsy's pale face turned very red, and her eyes drooped, while Hamp still held her hand. The music now struck up, and the dance was declared for dancing.

"Come, Betsy; it's been a long time since you an' me tuk a trot together; let's hev a tramp w' the rest.

"Hi, Hamp! I belong to church now," she said softly; "beside, I teach the school."

"I'll be all right."

"Do you think it will?"

"Know it."

They were in the "first set," and when it is over Hamp, who seemed suddenly inspired with new life, led his flushed partner to a seat in the very farthest corner of the room.

"Betsy," he whispered in his coarse Pacific slope dialect, "it's been a long time since I set eyes on ye, but I never forgot ye, nor that Sunday evening when I left ye on the hill."

"Hamp, what made you go so sudden?" she asked.

He tried to speak, but his throat seemed to clog up despite himself. He crossed and uncrossed his legs, kicked the heavy mining boots on the floor, and drew his broad-brimmed hat lower down over his eyes. At last he said:

"Betsy, I guess I war a dot-rotted fool. Fact is, I was mad. Did ye mean it?"

"What?" she asked.

"That yer said Nout Newt Bowman."

"I don't remember now what I did say."

"Don't yer know I axed yer ter marry me?"

"Why, Hamp, you said maybe yer'd go with Newt Bowman."

"Oh, Hamp, I only said that to tease you."

"Wat that all?"

"It was."

"Then a silence fell upon both, and they sat hand in hand, so not see the crowded room and gay young dancers. The music was drowned with thought, and they had gone back ever so many years to that sunny afternoon when they were young and parted on the hillside.

He had not married, and neither had conquered. He was now rich and could have chosen a wife despite his lack of culture, from among the handsomest women in the country, but somehow this patient little woman seemed to possess a spell over him which no other being did.

He was first to break the silence.

"Betsy," he said, "what become o' News?"

"He married Kitty Winters long ago. Their oldest girl was married last week."

"Then ye didn't mean it?"

"What?"

"Ye didn't like Newt——"

"He was a good friend."

"Oh, bad blast it, yer know what I mean yer didn't love him?"

"No."

"I was a fool, then; but maybe it's not too late to mend. I wonder if ye would liv'e?"

"What do you mean?" she asked, trembling a little, while her face was radiant with a flame of joy.

"Yer be my wife. Now, let me know, an' settle it once forever. I axed ye that question mun on the twenty years ago. I want the answer to-night, or, if I'll leave, never to come back."

Betsy knew the danger of attempting to put him off, and said:

"Yes, Hamp, I love you, have loved you all these long years, and will never marry another."

"Ye hered me then did ye?"

"Yes."

"Why didn't ye say so when I axed yer?"

"Oh, it was so pleasant to coquet a little, you know, and I was so glad."

"Well, gal, don't rile me again, fur it takes nigh on to twenty years fur me ter cool off."

He will not answer you so any more, Hamp," she said, trembling with joy. "I am older now, and all such girlish folly is past.

"Will ye be my wife?" he again asked.

"Yes."

"Co-nsider.

"Oh, it's too soon."

"No; it's now or never. Some un' said Miss Jonathan Knickleboss was in the Squire, and he'll tie the knot for us right now. What ye say? I kin call up hose and leave in ten seckinds."

Betsy's face turned doubtly pale. She knew it would not do to trifle with her lover, whom until within the last few minutes she had thought lost, and after a brief struggle she said:

"Yes."

"Wat will this sets over, an' it'll be done. It won't take more n two or three minutes."

Hamp Knickleboss was at this moment swinging about in the giddy maze of a quadrille, pretty Polly Perkins as gay as a boy of eigh-teen. To Hamp, who could not hook delay, it seem, ed as if the quadrille was never to end.

"First fore fo' back again, alain ma lef, balance all, all promenade, swing yer partner, all sas-shay! white to the lively tune of the squeaky old fiddle came the tramping of feet. Uncle Jonathan's white hair tossed in the air, his form could be seen among the others, whirling and flitting about.

When the "set" was over, and he led his youthful partner in the dance to her seat, the old Squire was almost out of breath.

"Hold on thar, Squaire," said Hamp Flatsnarb, leading the blushing Betsy forward. "Afore ye set down thar's a leetle job I want ye to do, while we're all in the notion. Nigh onto twenty yars ago this gal an' me had about come to the conclusion we'd trot in double harness; but by a little misunderstanding the lead proved a blind, an' I wamosed to prospect elsewhar. We've got it all fixed up now, an' if I'll give ye a few words to make us partners for life I'll be much obleged to ye, and gin yeand Aunt Tilda a present o' a thousand dollars apiece.

A shout went up from everybody, and it was several moments before Uncle Jonathan could sufficiently recover his composure to command the peace.

Order was at last restored, and then the Squire, panting from his late exertions, said:

"Jine yer right hands."

They did so, and in a few moments the ceremony was completed.

"Now, if I bust a hen sich a dot-rotted fool thinks a been done twenty yars ago," said Hamp.

"That's so, Uncle Jonathan, but ten millions won't undo them twenty yars, and I'm mighter an happiness I might a had wi the best woman on earth."

Betsy, who had been standing like one stupefied ever since her marriage, with three fair arms around her husband's neck and burst into tears of joy.

"Tut, there, there, Betsy, gal; don't take on so more, nor I'm sich a dot-blasted fool I'll stop ye. Ye kin hev all the gold in all the mines in the Rockies; but let's not spoil the dance.

The dance went on, and when the guests began to go home early in the morning they all took leave of the bride and groom. Aunt Tilda was the happiest of all, as she kissed the pretty bride she said:

"Ye've somehow managed ter get that I begin ter fear I'd never see.

"What?" the blue lip bride asked.

"Betsy Gamp's wedding."

How to Carve Poultry.

An expert carver can divide poultry without removing the fork from the breastbone or turning the bird on the dish, but a beginner will do well to have a small fork at hand for the purpose of laying cut portions aside as the carving progresses. Turn the bird so that the carving fork can be held in the left hand and firmly fixed in the breastbone, and use a sharp knife with a small flexible blade. First cut off both drumsticks at the knee joint, and then remove the second joints. With a tender fowl this is not a difficult matter; but both strength and skill are necessary to cope successfully with a tough or underdone turkey. In case very strong sinews are plentiful all about the leg joints. Next cut off the first joints of the wings, or the pinions, and then the joints nearest the body. This method of cutting off the first joints of the legs and wings of the body saves that troublesome feat of hunting those members while they are being disjointed; frequently they will jump on the platter and spatter the dish gravy.

After the wings are removed cut off the merry thought or wishbone, and then the wing and breast bones, which are the tender to the backbone; then carve the breast in medium thin slices, and serve the bird, giving gravy and stuffing on each plate. If the diners are numerous it may be necessary to cut half more of the flesh, and even to do another the carvers. This can be done with more or less ease, as the carver understands the anatomy of the bird. If a carver would study the location of the joints while carving, and take the trouble to cut up several chickens by the joints, he would soon find the bones are joined together, subsequent carving would be easy. The joints of all birds are similarly placed, so nearly identical in point of junction, that one is a guide in all others.—Juliet Corson, in Harper's Bazar.

WHITE HAIRS are like the sea foam which caps the waves after a storm.

INDIRECT TAXATION.

The Beauties of a Protective Tariff Made Plain—Some Startling Figures.

BY E. B. EVENSON.

During the year 1866 the revenue from customs amounted to $192,903,023. This amount of money was advanced by the importers and added to the price of the goods. The consumer consequently paid both the original price and the duty. That is what we call indirect taxation.

Now I simply wish to show how indirect taxation operates, and what loss the people actually sustain by upholding such a system.

In the first place, it costs from $8,000,000 to $8,000,000 to collect the revenue from the duties. In the second place, it enhances the price of the goods. It is this second part of the loss for which we are clear, as a great many do not have the faintest idea of what it amounts to.

The average duty on imported goods, according to Secretary Manning's report, is somewhat more than forty-six per cent.

Let us take a unit, one dollar's worth of imported goods, and suppose that it goes through the hands of three wholesale dealers and one retail dealer before it reaches the consumer, and that the profit on capital invested is ten per cent. to each wholesale dealer and twenty-five per cent. to the retailer. We shall then have the following progression of costs:

Value of the goods	$1
Duty, 46 per cent	.46
First cost	$1.46
First, 10 per cent	.146
Second cost	$1.606
Second, 10 per cent	.1606
Third cost	$1.7666
Third, 10 per cent	.17666
Fourth cost	$1.94326
Fourth, 25 per cent	.48326
Cost to the consumer	$2.4291

Now let us suppose this same dollar's worth of goods imported free of duty, and that it passes through the same number of hands at the same rate of profit to each, as in the former case. The progression of costs will then be as follows:

Value of the goods	$1
First cost	$1
First, 10 per cent	.10
Second cost	$1.10
Second, 10 per cent	.110
Third cost	$1.21
Third, 10 per cent	.121
Fourth cost	$1.331
Fourth, 25 per cent	.3331
Cost to the consumer	$1.6641

The difference between the two costs is, of course, 76½ cents, of which the government gets 46 cents, minus the cost of collecting it. The extra cost, paid by the people, is more than 30 cents, of which the government gets but one-half. Where does the other 15 cents go? It goes into the pockets of those who handle the goods, as a legitimate profit on the capital invested on account of the tariff. As far as the consumer is concerned, he might just as well have lost that much money on his way to town as to be robbed in this indirect way by the method of taxation. Of course the merchant, who gets the profit can not see much difference, as he is not so long as he is in a position to charge a legitimate profit on the extra outlay and to transfer the whole burden to somebody else. But how can the farmers and the day laborers to transfer it?

Why do we uphold such a system of indirect taxation? If we must pay the 46 cents tax any way, why not pay it directly and at once before it has increased over 67 per cent. Farmers and day laborers complain of hard times. But are they not needlessly making beasts of burden of themselves?

This 30 cents' waste is on a single dollar's worth. Let us take 40 per cent as an average duty, so is 30 cents' loss to the consumer on a dollar's worth of the common necessaries of life, which the farmer and day laborer need, the duty is much higher than 40 per cent on luxuries and costly goods the duty is much lower and the loss smaller.

If we divide $192,903,023 by 46 and multiply by 30 we get $126,050,000 as the actual loss for the past year. Not only this, remember that about half of besides; nor as the price paid for "protection," but as the unavoidable waste of the system of tariff. It is a dead loss of $2 for every man, woman, and child in the country. A total loss of $10 to every family of five persons and $20 for every family of ten. In twenty years it is a loss of over three and a half billions of dollars.

Let us consider part of this enormous waste, as well as the greater Part of the tax, is paid by the rich consumer, it may be said. I deny it. The duty on luxuries is a great deal lower than on the duty on the necessaries of life. Then, again, the families of the rich generally small, while the families of the farmers and day laborers and workingmen in general are large. And it takes just as much salt to preserve a pound of meat for a poor man as it does for a rich man, and just as much sugar to sweeten a cup of tea for a working girl as it does for the young daughter in the land. Moreover, the farmers and day laborers consume a much greater number of hands at the same rate of profit to each, as in the former case. The progression of costs will then be as follows:

Value of the goods	$1
First cost	$1
First, 10 per cent	.10
Second cost	$1.10
Second, 10 per cent	.110
Third cost	$1.21
Third, 10 per cent	.121
Fourth cost	$1.331
Fourth, 25 per cent	.3331

HIS DEPTH OF WOE.

Och, Kittie, I love ye, an' faith I can't mend it,
Yer lips are so rosy, yer eyes are so blue,
With a smile that's so roguish—the saints all defend it!
That if I am ravin', the fault is wid you.

Ye chide me an' frown, yet mosh! it is thinkin',
More angry ye look wid one word I do go;
Sure, Kittie, me heart like a stone would be sinkin',
If I thought that wid more than yer lips yer spake too.

Then out on ye foolin', me darlin', nor tease me;
But end this suspense if ye raison me fire—
In course there is many another could please me,
An' makin, thy pretself, yer a true, bonny wife.

Don't flash wid yer two eyes, I didn't quite mean it—
Though the truth tis the same, an' the devil say so—
Tis come to my arrumes—och, must I explain it—
Me socks are all out at the heel an' the toe.

There's the pig, the poor darlin', an' sure he is ill—
Wid premonin' an' moanin'—begosh it's a sin!
From mornin' till night the poor creature is lazin'
An' no one to carry his sheets to the pin.

This come to me shanty, I beg of yes, Kittie;
Say yis, an' wid yer I'll be dancin' a jig;
If not I'm mosh'd in yer heart yis take pity,
Och, Kittie, remember the woes of me pig!

A POET'S BITTER EXPERIENCE.

The Story Told of a Rhymester Who Is Known Only as "Horace" Editor.

How many men would soberly write themselves down as poets by profession in the yearly census! I know one poet, really a poet, who has published four volumes of poetry—I use the much abused word advisedly and in its highest sense—and I suppose that not one-third of his friends and acquaintances have any notion that his literary work takes any other direction than that of journalism—he certainly would give journalism as his profession, and I doubt if there be any department of poets in the commercial directory of this city. Another poet I have known is a stockbroker in Wall street; a third edits a most unpoetic and commercial publication; a fourth writes reports on horse races for a daily paper, and is well known for his graphic descriptions and knowing prophecies concerning horse flesh.

This last poet is a stirring, lively fellow, with a family to support, and he signs his little surreptitious volume (I have seen it with an assumed name; he would not have it known at "the office" that the pretty book, with its exquisite dedication to the writer's wife, and its tender love poems to her, was written by him, for four times the money that its publication cost him. The wife knows it, half a dozen intimate friends and the publisher know, but nobody else knows for sure who or what the author is. Two hundred copies of the book were sent to newspaper offices in different parts of the country, fifty to such men and women as had helped the poet through their lives or writings, twenty-five were sold, and 225, the balance of the edition, stand on a shelf in the dark cellar under the bookseller's office. "Poetry is a drug in the market" is the common phrase of the publishers to-day, and yet it is hard to believe that there is no sale for the poet in the present and the future. What did my friend, the horse racing poet, get back from his little volume, that cost him so many sleepless nights, such exquisite anxiety, such grievous birth pangs, such painful, loving labor, so many hard earned dollars? A large bill from his publisher, 100 newspaper criticisms, some of which mocked, some of which patronized, some quoted, some philosophized on, a few of which praised his venture into verse.

It was my fortune to sit with him and his wife in their new cheery parlors and read the criticisms, which at the end of every week he brought home, clipped from newspapers, magazines, reviews and theatre programmes from every section of the country. Very few of the writers had read the book, and fewer had thought about it. I was surprised to find how quietly he took some of these notices, which showed so plainly that the writers had barely skimmed the volume and had used it merely as a peg to hang a paragraph upon. The little flurry wife, who had gone without a new frock or bonnet the whole year through, who had pinched and economized her luxuriously natured self in a thousand different ways in order that the book—her book—written for love of her, might be fittingly printed, would cry with angry disappointment and sympathy for her husband, but he took it all patiently, heroically. He read the pert wit at his expense, the heartless ridicule, the lukewarm, perfunctory praise from a critic who was under obligations to the house which brought out the book, the misapprehension, the article written by a man who had read the first and last verses of a happy idyl and mistook it for a tragedy and proceeded to reduce the poet to fragments, to bray him in a mortar for serving the tragic muse in these days when the public wants cheerfulness and comedy. All these he read with a calm gravity.

He pasted all the extracts carefully into a book; they took up many pages, and on one, the last in the book, he put the half-dozen real criticisms out of the whole lot. Two of these praised him and encouraged him; two criticised him from a high and intellectual standpoint; one told him that he had lived too late; and the sixth dispassionately pointed out to him what a waste of time the writing of the book had been. Around this page the poet drew a line with his red chalk pencil, and then put the book away, and began writing out the notes he had made on the race at the Country club that afternoon.

This experience of my friend's has led me to much speculation as to the poet of the future. What manner of man, what style of writer will he be?—Boston Transcript.

The Barmaids of London.

The 25,000 women employed in pouring liquor down the huge throat of thirsty London are young and good looking. The first requisite demanded of the barmaid is that she shall be pretty, and the second that she shall not be under 19 nor over 30, though many publicans and sinners draw the line at 35 years of age. Her popular name is Polly. Polly, as a rule, has a skin wholesome in its pink and whiteness, and not averse to little dimples. A thick crop of curly hair is cut close to her head, and her eyes, be they black or blue, are sure to be fine. Polly's poorest feature is her mouth, for it is comely cut, and only the redness of her lips and her splendid teeth make one forget the glimpse of her gums when she laughs. A black dress, a white collar and a coquettish apron give an air of refinement and neatness that always natives.

It is taken for granted that Polly must be light of foot and deft of hand. She must be honest in money matters and good tempered. Above all, she must not be squeamish. To the gilded youth of Great Britain the barmaid is a special prey, a creature for his benefit, and he is quick to pick out the prettiest one behind the bar. There she is, chained to her place as securely as if to a log. He can stare at her as long and as meaningly as his likes. He can say bad words and she dare not resent it, because he has ordered a brandy and soda. Then he leaves a stale joke, or compliments her in the coarsest of terms, inflavored with frequent "my dears," and she has to smile and look as if she liked it, and by and by she comes to like it, and that's where the mischief begins.—Mrs. Robert P. Porter in New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Traveling in Europe.

There is no system of checking baggage abroad, and as one must of necessity "keep an eye" on his belongings at every stage of the journey, it is a good plan to have but one article to look after. A large supply of underclothing is not necessary, for six hours at any hotel allows ample time for laundry work. The traveling dress should be warm enough to allow for any change of temperature. Extreme heat is the exception, and it is better to endure it for two or three hours in the middle of the day than to suffer from cold all the rest of the time. Plenty of wraps are after all much more comfort than care. The need of them when they are beyond reach is always exasperating.

The old world is slow and conservative, as the old is wont to be. There is no where the hurry and scramble which characterize the new one. Waiters and porters will take their time, and a goodly share of it. The postman does not run at heading pace, nor the calman urge his horse out of a walk without an extra shilling at the whip handle. Do not be disappointed if you find no stores open before 9, 9:30 or 10 in the morning, when you are eager to do a few errands before catching the train." And never forget when the foreign fashions of travel, business or pleasure worry and hinder you, that you have voluntarily encountered them and ought to make the best of them.—Boston Transcript.

Tyrannizing Over a Parisian Tyrant.

One of the most famous oculists in Paris tells a droll story of his employer, a millionaire, who is fond of lording it over the man's importunities. One day the doctor stopped Mr. Janier on the stairs. "My fine fellow," he said, "let me look at your eye. Ah! I thought so. You must have that eye treated at once. Come in an hour and I'll examine you." The man, in great alarm, promised to do so he was bid, and at the appointed time appeared in the doctor's office. After a thorough examination he was told nothing but the greatest care on the doctor's part could save his sight. It was a lucky thing for the poor concierge having come to the house to watch over him! In half an hour the tables were turned; the oculist had been the terrified man, now it was the janitor. His gratitude knew no bounds; nothing was too good for this clear doctor who kindly dropped a globule of pure water in his eye every other day, and thus saved his sight.—Boston Herald.

The Difficulty of Matching Teeth.

"Matching teeth" is one of the most tiresome and difficult tasks incident to dentistry. As used in the profession, the term means the selection of artificial teeth that will correspond in shape and color with those that nature has provided. To match in color is the serious work. The slightest variation in teeth not noticeable before the plate has been made becomes a serious fault as soon as the false tooth appears at the side of the natural one. The shape is less trying on the patience, though a great measure of the success depends upon care in this detail. If more than one false tooth is to be inserted, care must be taken that they be not perfectly uniform in size and shape. Perfect regularity even in natural teeth often causes suspicion among gossipy observers.—Albany Express.

A Miniature Water Spout.

A whirlwind or small cyclone about fifteen feet wide passed over a pond at Greenville, Ala., forcing the water up for about two or two and one-half feet in entire width, and then twisting it into a pillar about a foot in diameter. This then was perpendicular for about six feet, when it gradually widened until a height of about sixty or seventy feet was attained. The water then fell in a spray. Those who witnessed it say that the whirlwind formed a huge goblet of water, and it was one of the prettiest sights they ever witnessed.—Chicago News.

Trout Salad as a Midnight Dish.

I heard the other day of a new dish here in Boston which struck me as rather appetizing, especially for the time of day it was taken, which was an hour before midnight. It was after the theatre, when something cooling is welcome, that a trout salad was thought of. The trout were served up cold, with lettuce and mayonnaise dressing, and proved to be just the thing to make the closing hour of the day serene.—Boston Post.

Cavetal Quaker City Business Men.

A stock broker and a merchant had just concluded a business transaction which left the former owing the merchant a small amount of money. "I will settle with you next Tuesday," remarked the broker, "but in case I die in the mean time then people will be responsible for the amount and will pay it promptly." As he spoke the man of stocks handed the merchant the card of a well known business house.

"Oh, that's all right," returned the latter; "I don't want the card. You're not going to die so soon."

"There's no telling about that," was the broker's wise response. "We brokers on Third street always keep our business matters in such a shape that no trouble will fall upon our customers or creditors in case we die. At this moment all my affairs are in a satisfactory condition. If I die to night there would not be the slightest complication. My family would know to a penny just how much I left them, my creditors would be provided for, and every other detail of my business life would be covered."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

CHICAGO BOODLERS.

Racy Developments—The Runaway McGarigle Believed to Be in Canada.

A CHICAGO telegram of Thursday last says:

Interesting and racy developments were made here yesterday in the boodling trial, in which a number of persons testified to selling goods to the aldermen and paying the money over to the boss of the gang. Several of the witnesses admitted that they had sworn to false accounts at the city clerk's office in order to make up the money for the boodle gang. Henry C. Walker, a carriage manufacturer, swore that a big property belonging to his name and his signature in the transfer of the property to Mike McDonald was forged. The general conviction and impression in Chicago that the entire batch of indicted officials will be convicted and sent to the penitentiary. McGarigle is now believed to have sailed from Ch. icago on the schooner R. Blake, which cleared suddenly from this port for Port Colborne, Ontario, on the Canadian Dominion. An interest in the schooner belongs to Dr. S. John, the friend of the fugitive, who had a long conversation with him on the last business day afternoon. A yacht is in pursuit of the R. Blake, which has not reported at any port since leaving Chicago.

LIFE CRUSHED OUT.

Fearful Collision Near Hopedale, Ill., of Freight and Construction Trains—Twelve Men Killed and Many Others Wounded.

A CHICAGO & ALTON freight train collided with a construction train near Hopedale, Ill., Wednesday afternoon, wrecking both trains, killing an unknown number of men, and hurting five others, four of whom will die. A Bloomington dispatch gives the following particulars of the disaster:

The construction-work train, carrying a crew of forty-five men, left Bloomington to patch up two miles of track between Hopedale and Minier, two miles south of Hopedale. Instructions were left at Hopedale to stop the through freight No. 47, which was due in an hour. The engineer of the freight train misunderstood the order, and the Hopedale operator also failed through the town without stopping. The union train was just leaving the main track when the train was seen a mile and a half away coming back toward Hopedale. The two cars containing the Italian laborers were the following were killed on the construction train: Morris Dunseth, Waterloo; Jerry Sullivan, Ill.; James Boyle, Ill.; Hopedale, Ill.; Antonio Jacobo, Ill.; Jacob Barrow, Ashland, Ill.; James Kalsing, residence unknown. The wounded were as follows: August Kaste, Bloomington, Ill.; another Swede, name Ely, Hopedale, Ill.; Jay Graham and foot crushed; Sam Gaston, Hopedale, Ill.; Sam Stanley, Tallula, Ill., head injured; Mike Kanalakis, Hopedale, leg hurt; Thomas Kavanagh, road master Chicago and Alton, leg and ankle sprained; Frank Holmes, engineer of the freight, head and shoulder hurt, long, unknown, badly hurt; Fireman Mallory of the freight, head and leg hurt. The Italian wounded were taken to Hopedale. Latest accounts give the number of killed as twelve, and report wounded. The additional killed were all workmen on the construction train.

Ohio Republicans.

THE Ohio Republican Convention met at Toledo on Wednesday. Daniel Ryan, of Seneca County, was made temporary chairman. In his speech upon taking the chair, and in that of the Chairman of the State Committee in calling the convention to order, John Sherman was heartily boomed for the Presidency. Two resolutions were offered in the convention—one giving Sherman an unqualified indorsement as a Presidential candidate, and the other merely calling the attention of the Republicans of the State to his "eminent services and splendid career" in connection with the national nominations of 1888. Both were referred to the Platform Committee.

Iowa Railway Lands.

A Washington dispatch of Thursday says:

The Secretary of the Interior to-day, on application of settlers in O'Brien County, Iowa, ordered the United States land office to restore 10,000 acres of land in that county claimed by the Sioux City and St. Paul and the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Companies, directed the Commissioner of the General Land Office to make formal demand on the Sioux City Company for patents to the land, a very controversy of 10,000 acres, in accordance with the act of Congress of March 3, 1887, in case of refusal he (the Secretary) will request that suit be instituted. The Secretary has also decided to modify the restoration by 2,000 acres of Iowa to the United States, the Sioux City and St. Paul Company claiming the land. Sioux City, Iowa, will be benefited by the Sioux City and St. Paul road, but were withheld by the State because of the non completion of the road to Sioux City, the same having been constructed only to Leeds.

THE EASTERN STATES.

ONE of those frightful accidents which come with appalling suddenness when there is no apparent reason why they could not be easily avoided took place on the Erie R. R. between Allendale and Hohokus, N. J., Thursday. The catastrophe was attended with as appalling loss of life, and over a dozen mangled bodies on the track attested the neglect of some one whose duty it should have been to give warning of the impending disaster. A gang of Italian laborers was at work ballasting on the railroad a little distance from a sharp curve about three-fourths of a mile above Hohokus. The Chicago express, which was due an hour before, had not been arrived, and there was no hurry at work, unconscious of the terrible fate which was in store for them. The delayed express, rushed round the curve before the men had the slightest warning, and dashed through the working force at fifteen or twenty miles an hour, and scattering many others. The shrieks of the dying were heard everywhere, and when the train came to a stop the scene presented the sickening sight of being covered with mangled men, some of whom were still living, with arms and broken limbs, pieces of ragged flesh being scattered in all directions. Some of the laborers were mangled beyond description and crushed out of all semblance of humanity. To most of the victims death must have come instantaneously, but some of them appeared to be yet quivering and life ebbing away when the train was reached by the standard.

FRESHNESS STORMS and floods are reported in New England.

IN No. 1 shaft of the Susquehanna Coal Company, at Nanticoke, Pa., an explosion of gas occurred, injuring three miners in a shocking manner. One of the victims is dead and the others can not live.

THE WESTERN STATES.

MAYOR FRANCIS, of St. Louis, has appointed a committee composed of many prominent citizens to invite President Cleveland to visit that city during the fall festivals.

TEXAS cotton is rapidly spreading among the farms of Arkansas and Southern Missouri, Illinois, Kansas, and farmers and stockmen are losing heavily.

A dispatch from Streator, Ill., gives the following account of a terrible powder explosion in that city on Thursday morning:

About 2 o'clock a. m. the residents of this city were awakened from slumber by a terrible roar of what appeared to be thunder, which was followed by a shaking as if the end of the earth and a sweeping rush of air which made the houses tremble to their foundations. A flash of lightning, so vivid as to almost blind the individual thought his own house had been struck, followed the terrible roar, emerging from the crash of broken glass and falling of shutters and chimneys. The explosion was felt in all parts of the southeastern part of the city, and people in the northeastern part of the city felt the concussion distinctly. The explosion of about ten tons of powder stored in the city magazine, located in the Michigan and Illinois Coal Company's shaft, was the cause of the damage. Bricks and stones were hurled into the air, and fell in the surrounding yards with such violence as to penetrate the earth to a depth of from six to ten inches. A quarter of a mile in all directions the ground was literally ploughed up by the force of the flight and scattered over the greater distance, however, was done by the concussion of air. Trees were uprooted and carried away, or were crushed into kindling-wood. A number of persons were injured in the attempt to save some valuable property from the buildings to the earth. About fifty dwellings in the immediate vicinity of the explosion were damaged so as to be scarcely habitable. No lives were lost, but a few persons were injured, the most severely being a boy who was struck by a piece of the boiler while in the street. The explosion occurred at 1 o'clock, and there were but a few hours earlier hundreds of lives saved as the city was asleep when the explosion was printed in the shadow of the fatal explosion. The explosion was felt in Streator within a radius of ten miles, and windows were broken and dishes rattled in Ottawa, Ill., and in Bloomington, Ill., and in Chicago, Ill., and in Ashland, Ill., James Kalsing, residence unknown. The wounded were as follows: August Kaste, Bloomington, Ill.; another Swede, name Ely, Hopedale, Ill.; Jay Graham and foot crushed; Sam Gaston, Hopedale, Ill.; Sam Stanley, Tallula, Ill., head injured; Mike Kanalakis, Hopedale, leg hurt; Thomas Kavanagh, road master Chicago and Alton, leg and ankle sprained; Frank Holmes, engineer of the freight, head and shoulder hurt, long, unknown, badly hurt; Fireman Mallory of the freight, head and leg hurt. STATE OF KANSAS, EXECUTIVE DEPT., }
TOPEKA, JULY 21, 1887. }

William Henry Smith, General Manager Associated Press.

MY DEAR SIR—On the 24 of July last, a special dispatch was sent from St. Joseph, Mo., to a Chicago paper, in which it was stated that "the closing of the saloons in Atchison, Kan., has cut off the most profitable source of revenue, amounting to thousands of dollars a year, and as a result the city has no revenue to keep it going; that the police force, with the exception of the marshal and one patrolman, has been suspended; that the services of the firemen have been dispensed with, and that the gas and electric lights were to be shut off."

The dispatch was utilized by the Associated Press, and was published in all related Press, and thus published in all parts of the country. As a result, I have received many letters from officers of the State, calling my attention to the falsity of the statement it embodied, and have seen its alleged facts commented upon in many of newspapers as evidence that the abolition of saloons has brought a prosperous city in Kansas to the verge of bankruptcy. Similar letters have been received by the Mayor of Atchison, and by many other citizens of Atchison, and the Press generally referring to Cleveland's administration, he said that so well and its power to impress the public, he thought it was little, if any, exception except from those who expect to get the offices in the Republican party. About civil-service reform he said:

When an election is made a condition to a fourth support, there are many who would be willing to see the party in power remaining in office were promptly turned out, and the offices given to their friends. As to the civil-service law, it is a matter of opinion, and it cannot be uncertain in meaning or effect. It was the result of a compromise. The Republicans should assist a Democratic President in the enforcement of the law, and I have let us have the contrary. If it be the civil service law, it is the law, and it is the duty of the President to see that it is enforced. If it be the civil service law, it is the duty of the President to see that the provision that first year. The whole system of appointments in the public service letter strike boldly and firm, and therefore I am in favor of the enforcement. Yours very truly,

JOHN A. MARTIN.

PROHIBITION IN IOWA.

Attorney General Baker Tells How Prohibition Works in Iowa—Not the Anarchy State.

(From the Des Moines Register.)

Many inquiries have been sent to this State by persons in other States, to the effect that the effects of Iowa's experiment with prohibition, in regard to the enforcement of the law, regulating all manner of falsehoods about the result of the law. In 1886 the Attorney General wrote to the State for them to escape exposure. The following letter from Attorney General Baker in response to an honest inquiry for information, and it very effectually disposes of some of the stock stories which are in circulation against the prohibition law in Iowa:

DES MOINES, Iowa, June 28th 1887.

Dear Sir: Your favor of the 25th ult. is at hand, enclosing a circular reflecting on the management of the prohibitory law in Iowa, and particularly on the conduct of Constables and Sheriffs in the seizure of liquors and arrests under said law. I am also in receipt of the 23d of June, in which is a letter written by Mr. Merritt, Sheriff of Polk County, Iowa. You can use to say whether or not the letter and circular contain a true statement of the facts or is misleading. I will give you the facts and you can judge for yourself and your people can best judge of the true condition of affairs in Iowa.

Mr. Merritt says in his letter that the effect of prohibition is to make Iowa "a nursery establishment against neighborhood, crime and pauperism." Now, the fact is, there is no such thing as a "nursery establishment" in Iowa. The contrast shows of the "nursery establishment" is only in his imagination when making that statement. I will explain what I mean. Prohibition in the State that have been arrayed against each other ever since the adoption of the law. Prohibitionists have been arrayed against some other citizens; there is no "nursery establishment" in Iowa. Men are embittered by force, violence, mob, and lawlessness, and the contempt of the law. That class of citizens have been arrayed against those who have to defend the law. It will certainly be a "nursery establishment" for lawlessness. The saloon power has no regard for law and order. It is based on force and violence, and you may as well expect to reform a tiger by feeding him on the human world, the flesh, and the devil when you attempt to make a saloon keeper. The Democratic party has recently been working a scheme to get a city like Des Moines to get rid of more than one saloon. It has been the result here. Sheriff Palmer, the present sheriff of this county, gives the following information:

There are now in the jail, whereas in last year there were as many as thirty saloons there. The average has been about twenty-five. The Sheriff's fees in serving criminal process have fallen off quite a little short of former terms by one-third. The Sheriff says that the number sent to the penitentiary by the court just adjourned. The Sheriff says that the number ran from eight to sixteen each term. Now, I am informed by the Sheriff that there are but two convicts from Des Moines now in the penitentiary. The Sheriff says that during his term of office the Court there was not a criminal appeal from a crime occurred during his term of office. Sheriff Merritt says my term of office. Sheriff Merritt says in his letter that "business is good, and I guess it is the man our worthy Postmaster appointed." I guess he means that he knows his letter. I know of no other business that has been running for the enjoyment of prohibition, except that of criminal lawyers, sheriffs, and schoolkeepers. Yet, I will also include gambling houses—they have been very seriously affected.

Emigration to Iowa has not ceased by any means. The State is prosperous and is people peaceable and more law-abiding than at any time in the past.

There has been a good, healthy influx of business men to Des Moines in the past year, and very many new and prosperous lines of business have been inaugurated. The city is building more and better business houses than in any season for a number of years, and the business improvement is almost daily of new and important enterprises that are being inaugurated by home and foreign capital.

In fact, the city of Des Moines is prospering, and is marching on to a good future of success. I regret to say, there have left Iowa. The best class have gone into the prohibition State of Kansas, and the vast tide of immigration that "Send us more of those good citizens that are making Kansas boom."

The saloon keepers and their accomplices, the gamblers, have emigrated to the license State of Nebraska, where the people in consequence are thereof in beginning to clamor for prohibition. Omaha has recently passed a law, and I understand, one of the Judges of the District Court of Iowa, and what is true in the district is true in every district in the State where prohibition has been enforced. The Sioux City Journal gives really a better report from his district. It is a great thing to see factories and elevators and jails for rent because they have stood in Iowa. Prohibition has greatly moved Iowa, and becoming more popular as the years go by.

Hoping that Texas may succeed in its efforts to emigrate and that Iowa may then outstrip Kansas in prosperity, I amm, yours truly,

MCDOWELL'S TEMPERANCE TIDES.

Mr. Powderly, in a recent contribution to the Journal of Labor Labor, thus vigorously strikes at the worst enemy of the workingman.

I know that in refusing to even touch a drop of strong drink I have made a decided enemy of more than another to that which I do not believe to be good for me, and I know I have made a friend by refusing to associate with men who get drunk. I know that I have made a friend by refusing to join admittance into the order of the Knights of Labor, and I know I am advising one or more to rent halls or meeting places, and I know that I am doing what I am right. I have done this from the time I first joined the order, in the common hall of our order. My position is well known to the members of our order. CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

Petoskey hotel and real estate men persist in trying to convince strangers that Charlevoix is out of the world, with no hotel or other accommodations for traveling people, and succeed in persuading a good many to stay away who intended to come here. On one train from the south last week, a large party were bound for Charlevoix (some of whom were posted as to the running of boats) and an agent of one of the Petoskey hotels tried to persuade them that there was no boat to Charlevoix till afternoon, while the Friant was at that moment nearing the Petoskey dock on her regular run to Charlevoix. One day this week, a gentleman from Charlotte, Eaton county, was told in a Petoskey hotel that the propellers Lawrence and City of Grand Rapids could not stop at Charlevoix for lack of sufficient depth of water in the channel. By reason of this statement, a lady on her way to Traverse City, who also intended to call on some Charlevoix friends, was persuaded to not take the Friant in the morning, and wait in Charlevoix for the Grand Rapids in the afternoon; the hotel man telling her that if she came over to Charlevoix, she would have to go back to Petoskey and go to Traverse City by rail, or wait for the next trip of the Grand Rapids. These are not isolated cases, but simply samples of what is occurring every day. No wonder Charlevoix clamors for a railroad. We need one, and we will have one, and it will probably continue northward whether Petoskey is willing or not. The Democrat probably echoed the sentiment of the people when it said a short time since that they failed "to see just exactly where any benefit would acerne to Petoskey from the construction of such a road."

How Gold May Grow.

Mr. Dalstroe, indeed, found by experiment that if a speck of gold were placed in a solution of the chloride, the gold would gradually grow into a small grain on any piece of wood or cork introduced into the liquid. In other words, the metal contained in the chloride would come out from its combination as native gold, and unite with the tiny speck of pure metal which served it as a nucleus. It is not improbable that the gold in quartz got similarly deposited round a common center, so that in the most literal sense it may perhaps be true (in spite of Aristotle's dogmatic statement to the contrary) that money grows, though very slowly.

It is a pleasant thought indeed, for the poor man, to know that gold is even now still growing. Mr. Brough Smyth has shown that it can be deposited nowadays in appreciable quantities within comparatively short periods. Bits of mineralized timber and beams from the galleries of the older workings in Australian mines have been found to exhibit, under the microscope, particles of gold, intermixed with crystals of iron pyrites, all through the central parts of the wood; and this gold must, of course, have gathered there from solution in water during the few years that have elapsed since the first discovery of the precious metal in Australia. Mr. Ulrich similarly notes that in the gold drifts auriferous pyrites is often found incrusting or replacing roots and twigs, and samples of such gold bearing wood, when submitted to an assay, have yielded amounts of the pure metal varying from a few pennyweights to several ounces per ton. Mr. H. A. Thomson further mentions a specimen of pyrites which had gathered in the center of an old tree trunk, and which yielded at the rate of as much as thirty ounces.—Cornhill Magazine.

A Very Dangerous Habit.

It is not at all uncommon to see people scratching the passages into the ears with pins, especially hairpins, toothpicks, ear scoops, pencils, etc. The habit is a very dangerous one. Many cases of serious inflammation of the ear and permanent deafness have resulted from it. The advice: "Never put anything into your ear but the end of your elbow," ought to be heeded.—Demorest's Magazine.

Worthy of a Philosopher.

A youngster under 4 years old was going from home for awhile. His governess was to be left behind; and feigning grief at the abandonment of her, she asked what she was to do while he was away. "Oh, sit on a mossy tone and weep," was the quick and apt reply, worthy of a proverbial philosopher himself.—Arkansaw Traveler.

A Little Afraid.

A Virginia preacher who believes in prayer met a bear in the woods the other day, and instead of putting his remedy into effect he jumped from a bluff into Cheat river and swam half a mile. He had never tried prayers for bear, and was a little afraid they'd skip a cog somewhere.

Quality of Butter.

From an examination of butter from various parts of France, M. E. Duclaux learns that, contrary to general opinion, the quality of this article depends largely on the breed of cattle and their food, the pasture soil, influence of season, age of milk, etc.

Of Interest to Bicyclers.

Bicycles are interested in a recent discovery in the manufacture of aluminum. The metal will be produced soon at one-tenth of its present cost, and a bicycle made of it would weigh about half as much as at present.

AROUND THE COUNTY.

Eveline.

Warm and dry weather.

D. Galbraith loaded 53 cords of bark on the schooner Sein, Monday.

Mrs. Jarman is still very sick.

Al. Draper, of South Arm, was in town Monday.

James Friel received a dispatch by telephone from Mrs. Friel in Detroit, that Mrs. Mary was worse, and to come. He left Friday morning. Mary has many young friends in Ironton and vicinity, who are anxious to hear of her recovery.

Mrs. Ayers, of New York, was in town last week three days, and stopped at Mrs. Robt. Bedwin's.

Green corn has again put in its appearance.

Mrs. Bryan, of New London, Ohio, and her daughter Mrs. William Myers, of Fairfield, this state, arrived Saturday on the Friant on a visit to Mrs. Maud Benson.

Miss Clara Hayden, we understand, is convalescent.

Geo. Jarman, Sylvester, Newson, and Al Dickey, who have been absent from home on the upper peninsula the past few months, returned last Thursday.

A good time was had at the social at John Johnson's last Friday evening.

Mrs. Cole and daughter Edith, of Bay Springs, visited at Mrs. G. McDonald's last week and this.

Aug. 9.

Wilson.

Blackberries are ripe.

Good harvest weather.

Mrs. Hudkins expects relatives from Indiana this week.

Mrs. Bowman's parents and sister are expecting to remain permanently.

Mrs. A. Nowland's mother and sisters are visiting her.

Richard Lewis and Harry Hudkins went to camp meeting at Vanderbilt on Sunday, July 31st.

Elder Tracy and family have returned from camp meeting.

J. R. Vanes has platted several acres of his property in South Arm, and has sold several lots recently.

Some of our citizens went whortleberrying beyond Vanderbilt. They report a barren, dry country, but plenty of berries.

Albert Todd met with quite an accident on Thursday last. He fell from the peak of Mr. Crawford's house to the ground. His fall was broken by striking the old house first, but for which it might have resulted fatally. He was bruised terribly, but was able to be taken home on Saturday.

August 10th.

Barnard.

Farmers are very busy harvesting.

Miss Howey closed a successful term of school here last week Wednesday, with a picnic, which was much enjoyed by all. She left for her home in Kalkaska on Friday.

Mr. Ingalls' steam thresher is in the neighborhood, threshing Avery peas.

Tony Clark spent Sunday in Harbor Springs, with his brother Adam.

Miss C. Thul of Chicago, and Mrs. McKeel of Charlevoix, were guests of Mrs. Harkness last week.

August 12th.

Burgess.

The oldest son of Mr. Simelton was seriously kicked by one of his father's mules one day last week.

Mr. Henry Hare moved into his new house, last Thursday.

Mr. John Gratsky arrived last Friday, and is looking up old landmarks.

Mrs. I. S. Webster leaves for southern Michigan next Monday, to visit a sister, and oldest son.

Horace Cortright, of Charlotte has been spending the past week with the family of W. C. Arnold.

Aug. 8th.

Ellsworth.

We are having sudden thunder showers these days.

Mrs. Himebaugh is visiting friends in Charlevoix.

Wm. Mudell Sr. and wife, of Leetsville Mich., are visiting relatives in this vicinity.

Parker McIntire, of Norwood, and a nephew, from Ohio, spent a few days here last week fishing.

Mrs. Frank Wrisley, who has been visiting relatives, in Charlevoix will return home today.

Aug. 9th.

South Hayes.

Very fine weather.

Oats are nearly ready to cut.

Mr. Fairbanks and son, of Traverse City, were in Hayes one day last week.

Miss Adda and Master Arthur Whitman returned home Saturday.

Mr. J. D. Purrish, of Ironton, was in Hayes one day last week on business.

Mr. J. Newsted is busily engaged getting out shingle bolts at present.

August 5.

The Ninth Dreaded Grizzly Bear.

Of all the known plantigrades (flat footed beasts) the grizzly is the most savage and the most dreaded, and he is the largest of all, saving the presence of his cousin the polar bear, for which nevertheless, he is more than a match in strength and courage. Some specimens measure 7 feet from tip of nose to root of tail. The distinctive marks of the species are its great size; the short nose of the tail as compared with the ears; the huge flat paws, the sole of the hind foot sometimes measuring 7 1-2 by 5 inches in a large male; the length of the hind legs as compared with the fore legs, which gives the beast his awkward, shambling gait; the long claws of the forefoot, sometimes 7 inches in length, while those of the hind foot measure only 3 or 4; the struck, bristling mane of stiff hair, often 6 inches long; the coarse hair of the body, sometimes 4 inches long, dark at the base, but with light tips.

He has a dark stripe along the back, and one along each side, the hair on his body being as a rule a brownish yellow, the region around the ears dusky, the legs nearly black and the muzzle pale. Color, however, is not a distinctive mark, for female grizzlies have been killed in one company with two cubs, of which one was brown, the other gray, or one dark, the other light, and the supposed species of "cinnamon" and "brown" bears are merely color variations of Ursus horribilis himself.—A. O. Shields in Harper's Magazine.

The Chinese Empress' Fortitude.

The empress regent of China is one of the most remarkable women of the age. Not content with directing the private policy of the most populous empire in the world with wonderful diplomacy and sagacity, she has now entered the ranks of competitors for the highest weight championship of the Celestial empire. Attired in a sort of bloomer costume, she takes daily lessons in boxing from an old coach. Her appearance at the age of 50, in short skirt, hitting out at her venerable preceptor, and occasionally receiving punishment herself, must be comical to the last degree, and the report on the matter forms the subject of a most disrespectful merriment on the part of the almond eyed denizens of the Chinese metropolis. The empress regent was a concubine of the Emperor Hien Fung, on whose death she was appointed to act as co-regent with the dowager empress during the minority of her son, the late Emperor Tung-Chi.

With unusual alacrity she has guided the ship of the empire through the tremulous times which have resulted from the opening up of the country to foreign trade, and has so conducted affairs as to have brought the nation to a relatively higher degree of prosperity and tranquillity than it enjoyed when she took up the reins.—Hong Kong Times.

No Inspiration of the Bottle.

"In a conversation with Read," said Mr. Grafton to the writer, "I once ventured to say, 'Read, did you take nothing but a pot of black tea into your room when you invoked the muse for "Sheridan's Ride?" To my surprise, in a most quiet and unexpected manner, he said, 'I took nothing else but that. Let me confess to you a fact. I can do nothing with the pen, unless I am clear headed. I know, he continued, 'that poem, with its faults, came from no inspiration of the bottle. I would like, however, to have corrected some of those faults, but Bayard Taylor advised me not to allow the least change or emendation, but to let it stand as written.' The wisdom of this advice insured its acceptance, and, if I mistake not, it now stands word for word as the muse gave it, nothing to add or subtract.

"Mr. Read also said this to me: They may talk what they choose about Byron, Burns, Poe and others writing so finely under the influence of drink, but I don't believe a word of it. If the tongue does wag, the brain will lag when much drink has been indulged in, for then I have discovered I am just about as dumb as a Princess Bay oyster."—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

Hay Fever an Aristocratic Malady.

The oldest note of national, personal and sexual superiority I ever heard of is susceptibility to hay fever. In Dr. Morrill Mackenzie's admirable monograph on this complaint and its treatment, I find that among races, the English and American, among classes, the upper and cultivated; and of the sexes, the male sex, are especially susceptible to hay fever. In the north of Europe it is almost unknown. It is rare in France, Germany, Italy and Spain; whereas in England it is frequent, and in America prevalent. Again, 95 per cent. of its martyrs are of the upper class, while agricultural laborers, who are most exposed to the causes of the complaint, are least subject to its attacks. Lastly, the male sex is more liable to it than the female, in the ratio of three to one. Therefore our susceptibility to hay fever is a mark of superiority for self congratulation, as indicating our superiority to less favored peoples in culture and civilization."—London Truth.

A Pretty Indian Legend.

A pretty Indian legend is current here this season. Chautauqua means "the place of easy death," and report says this is how the lake secured its name. An Indian maiden, mourning over the death of her lover, wandered away from her people seeking a poisonous root. In a secluded spot on the lake shore she found it, gathered freely and lay down to await death. The poison created delirium and a burning thirst. Her lover scented to come to her and offer fresh, cool water, yet when she reached out her hands for the grateful draught he vanished. She dragged herself to the edge of the lake, and stooping over to cool her parched lips in the waves, she saw her lover beneath the water holding up his arms to her. Joyfully she threw herself into the water and was never seen again. —Chautauqua Cor. New York Tribune.

It was supposed that the flagship Cumberland, when she was sunk by the Merrimac, had $100,000 in coin in her safe for the payment of the fleet. Many attempts have been made to recover the safe, and as much as $60,000 has been expended in the effort, it is said. Lately a New Haven wrecker succeeded in raising the safe, but on opening it only $40 in coin was found. The paper money it may have contained had dissolved or disappeared.

Fashions in Surgery.

M. Verneuil, the eminent surgeon of the Paris Academy of Medicine, sets forth in one of his recent public addresses some of the changing methods or "fashions" of which have characterized the history of surgery, instancing among other things the fact that in the Eighteenth century every man who had fallen on his head and was suspected to have cracked his skull was trephined, and that during the wars at the end of the last century and the beginning of this every gunshot wound of the extremities was treated by amputation. He went on to say that, at the time when he entered the medical profession, tenotomy was the rage, every tendon, every ligament, every muscle in every region of the body was cut—squinting, stammering, spinal curvature, bandy legs, even deafness was supposed to be thus cured.

We have, says M. Verneuil, trephined too much, tenotomized too much, resected too much, dilated too many strictures, excised the iris too often, operated for cataract too much in scraping cold abscesses; in proof of this he argues that in a great country like France with 37,000,000 inhabitants, the operation of transfusing is now performed not more than half a dozen times and that of trephining not more than a dozen times in a year; that in every country nowadays the spinal and lingual muscles of the hunchbacks and stammering are left alone; that in England, where resection was common, it is now but very rarely performed, and the surgeons are now nearly all agree in leaving the iris undisturbed.

A Lesson from a Little Barefoot.

The democratic government of our reading room when it was in Boston, was illustrated by a little barefooted newsboy sitting in one of the best chairs of the reading room, enjoying himself apparently for dear life. The great country was completely astounded. "Do you let barefooted boys in this reading room?" he asked. "You see I do not believe there is a reading room in all Europe in which that boy, dressed as he is, would enter." Then Mr. Arnold went over to the boy, engaged him in conversation, and found that he was reading the "Life of Washington," and that he was a young patriot of the decidedly anti-British tendencies, and, for his age, remarkably well informed.

Mr. Arnold continued talking with the youngster for some time, and as he came back to our desk the great Englishman said: "I do not think I have been so impressed with anything since that I have seen since arriving in this country as I am now with meeting this barefooted boy over a book on which they change the whole course of that boy's life, and may be the means of making him a useful, honorable citizen of this great country. It is, I tell you, a sight that every European not accustomed to your democratic ways."—Boston Herald.

New York's African Colony.

We are getting a colonies African colony among us. I do not allude to the long familiar settlement in Thompson street, which is American in all but color, but to a gathering of Moors, Arabs, Algerians and other members of the race raised on the north coast of the dark continent. I buy cigars from a gentleman on Broadway, and dicker for oriental rugs and bric-a-brac with a peddler from Tunis. There is a whole regiment of Algerians who meet in a certain wine shop popular with the French men of lower Sixth avenue, and Alexandria, Cairo and Arabia proper are all represented in the hundred kaleidoscopic faces. These North Africans are shrewd tradesmen. They seem to have been born with a genius for commerce. They take quite naturally to peddling, and travel from house to house and office to office with all sorts of wares that are just as likely to come from France as from Africa. The Moors appear to be the blackest in skin. Most of them are of a rich mahogany color, but with fine features and clearly cut lips. Some of the Arabs are also very dark. The Algerians and Tunisians look like badly sunburnt Italians. The Algerians talk a sort of patois French and the Moors a pigeon Spanish, but all of them pick up a smattering of English very rapidly—quite enough to drive a sharp trade for their own benefit in that tongue.—Alfred Trumble in New York News.

The Grasshopper in Folklore.

Among the oddities of zoological folklore I find the grasshopper written down as an idle and thoughtless person. It is of a loquacious kind, a chatterer, and therefore flighty, irresponsible, a no'er do well. It starves when hard times come; but lays by food in winter. So it figures as the opposite of the ant; a contrast to the careful and industrious ant. How old the idea may be no one can say, but, at any rate, it is venerable as the most ancient Sanskrit legends. For there we find the grasshopper spoken of as an irreverent individual and an unreliable. It runs a race with the ant, but after taking some advantage leaps in front of it, just as the hare does when racing the tortoise, and of course the ant plods on, and, again, it neglects to store its larder, and the ant—a detestable little prig in folklore—gives it a good lecturing when it ought instead to help the poor mendicant to a grain of wheat.—Gentleman's Magazine.

Age of Niagara Falls.

Since the original survey of the gorge in 1841, the science of geology has made surprising progress. It has been able, perhaps, to reduce the age of Niagara Falls from 200,000 years to less than 20,000. The falls, it now tells us, instead of cutting their way up the gorge from Lewiston, began their existence, as one cataract, not more than a mile north of where they now are.—Jane Meade Welch in Harper's Magazine.

A BROOKLYN BUTTON FACTORY.

How the Various Kinds Are Made—Men and Women Employed.

There were about twenty girls at work making or painting buttons. The power, drop and foot presses were in constant motion. In making metal buttons the sheet is first taken and put through the power press which turns out more shells in a minute than would fill a bushel basket. These almost shapeless bits of metal are then carried over to the drop, which falls on them with a heavy thud, and the tiny things of future use come out of it with a rim formed around the shell. The eye maker is then put in use, and next a machine called the closer is called upon to perform its duty and the button is finished except in color, which looks a dull yellow, but this is remedied and the metal buttons show their brightness by being put through a burning process in sackfuls which resemble ice cream freezers. Then they are cooled off in running water and taken to the stamping press, which turns out eyes, and out they come with the name of the maker stamped in the shell parts.

There are made in these establishments a thousand different varieties of metal buttons mostly for women's wear. Some are handsome to look at and others are not, but all go through the same process of manufacturing. The fancy buttons are taken to the painters, whose nimble fingers are continually busy while putting on the finishing touches. In back of the painters is a table ten layers of material before him from cut of which, by hand alone, he punches the same number of what are called toughs at one time and the whole operation works like a flash of lightning, so quick is the operation performed. The toughs are then taken alongside the table, where one of the work women attempted to show me how a cloth button was made and she had no time for listening to the explanation of the work by the young lady, the button was now in the cloth and need to be shipped for Europe or anywhere else.

She merely placed the cloth on top of the button machine and the eye in the tube, after which the two were connected and a sidelong movement of the foot did the rest, as the shell, eye and tough were sewed in and the cloth button was completed. Glove, shoe and all other kinds of buttons are manufactured in the same way. I was shown a cloth shoe button that at one time was patented and a capital of $100,000 invested in its manufacture. In another factory my attention was called to a metal button that will, when thoroughly known, do away with needle and thread. It is fastened in the same way as the cloth button by a self locking machine that is as cunning as it is simple.—Brooklyn Eagle.

An Open Letter.

Having opened my Cigar Factory in this village, and being supplied with a fine line of Leaf Tobacco, I am now ready to furnish the trade with a line of goods unsurpassed by any in Michigan. I shall also bring my long and varied experience in the manufacture of Cigars, and shall challenge competition on all grades of goods. Trusting I shall receive a liberal share of the public patronage, I remain,

Very respectfully,

F. D. PHILLIPS.

My goods will be found on sale with all dealers. F. D. P.

MORTGAGE SALE.—A mortgage dated 9th January 1891, executed by William E. Mc Donald (a married man) to Horace S. Harsha, and recorded in the office of the Register of deeds for Charlevoix county, Michigan, in liber 4 of mortgages, at page 326, on the 16th day of April following, upon which the entire principal and interest is now due and payable, and the sum of $1,000 and an attorney fee of $25 being the amount of which is now due and unpaid, it is necessary of which no suit or proceeding at law having been taken, will be foreclosed under the power of sale contained therein by a statutory sale of the premises therein described at the south door of the court house in Charlevoix on the 20th day of September next, at 10 o'clock forenoon, which said premises are situated in the village of Boyne City, Charlevoix county, and are described as follows, to wit: Lots 3 and 4 in block 4 of the village of Boyne City, according to the United States survey, at their front door in said

A LOVE SCENE IN IRELAND.

BY S. MOORE.

As I stood on a bank of the lovely Lough Erne
And gazed on the opposite shore,
I saw tripping down the brushwood and fern
My own little Eveline Gore.

Sheath the stem of a tree, on a lovely green mound,
She, smilingly, sat in my view;
I heard her sweet song, and my heart gave a bound,
While my love more impassionate grew.

So boat was at hand, and I longed to embrace
My fair one, the joy of my heart,
But the water flowed deeply—a dangerous space—
And sternly kept us apart.

Love conquered my fears, and gave strength to my arms,
And nerved me while crossing the flood;
And soon my sole hopes, clasped her alarms,
As dripping beside her I stood.

She owned to me then that the best of my love
On her heart such impression had made
That, being permitted, she'd wed me to prove
The truth of the words which she said.

What followed the reader may easily guess—
And oft when a ramble we take,
She'll ask—while the smile she can scarcely repress—
"Would you swim to me now over the lake?"

RATTLERS' GULCH.

BY RYE JOHNSON.

HARRY and Charley Blair, aged respectively seventeen and nineteen, were sons of a small farmer living in Ohio at the time the gold excitement broke out. Charley became infected with the fever that ought they stole away, and, in company with a neighbors son, made their way to St. Louis, and from thence, with a party of prospectors, to the mountains.

Many and varied were their adventures, but we have to do with but one. Fortunately for them, they fell in with an honest man who took a great liking to Harry and Charley, and who willingly consented to their accompanying his party.

They had been out for days, making their way over almost impassable walls of rock, through canyons and gulches, in search of one of the valleys or pockets where surface gold was principally found in those days.

One day Andy Carter, the leader, was badly hurt by a fall, and it was soon seen that he must be left behind and some one stay to care for him.

Not a sight of the precious metal had been seen, and our boys were weary and disheartened. They at once volunteered to stay, he being the only one in the party that had troubled to be kind to the lads.

They were journeying up a broad canyon when the accident happened, and the first mile camp was selected for a suitable one for Andy. It was soon found, a tiny valley a half mile away, with water and cool underbrush that would do for food.

The whole party, some twenty-two, proceeded thither at once, carefully carrying the wounded man.

"The sugar bowl," the boys at once dubbed it, and no other name would so well describe its shape. There was perhaps a quarter of an acre of land, inclosed by a high wall of rock; no outlet save the narrow ravine, through which they had entered.

A fine spring bubbled and boiled from the rock upon one side, danced and sang across the valley, and disappeared in an opening in the wall of rock upon the other.

Upon three sides the rock was smooth, save scarce a footing for a bird, but upon the fourth it sloped gradually upward, and was covered with a dense growth of stunted vines.

Near the spring a tent was pitched for Andy, and the party robbed the neighbors thickets to make him comfortable.

Then leaving a generous supply of ammunition and provisions, the party went on their way, and none of them were seen again by our party for years.

Andy looked blue when he saw the lone one disappear, and turned heavily upon his bed, saying, "I'm as fast in this bed as anything."

"Well, boys, we are in for it; I'm afraid you will be sorry you stayed. There's neither gold or glory to be gained here."

"Who knows?" cried Charley, gaily striking his gaude into the earth, "we may be standing upon a mine now."

Andy laughed heartily, and hoped it was so.

"But, boys, the first thing to does to decide is how of this arsenal," and he glanced smilingly at their supplies piled in a corner.

"You, of course," cried the boys in concert.

"All right," he replied. "Then I move that you both search the wall all about for a secluded spot to store our goods. We are too far away from the camp to make it worth our while, if these get dam spoed.

"All right," came cheerily, and the search began.

The ground was almost made, with no discovery, and a feeling of disappointment was beginning to be felt by the boys, when a shout from Harry, who was slightly in advance, proclaimed the desired find.

"Hurrah! here it is!" And he drew aside a certain of vines and branches of the place, revealing a deep cavity—just a cave for the purpose.

It was very near the tent, too, which was fortunate, as he said he could keep guard while the boys were absent, giving as his opinion that neither would be considered to be idle long.

Such a thought had not occurred to the boys, and they shook their heads, but events proved the elder man's judgment to be correct.

For a few days to lie at full length upon the green grass was a luxury, but then Harry began to view the bush-grown valley archard, and wonder what lay beyond. From wondering to climbing, and then began a series of exploring expeditions. Not to the boys' credit, be it said, they never left the wounded man alone. His fever was in his right hip, and for some days he suffered terribly from it, under the fatherly care, under his instruction, boys fetched and carried, and then it was he began to gain strength.

After a tedious climb, many small ravines and gullies were found, through some of which bright streams of icy water sped merrily.

Harry was a boy of sound sense and good judgment, while Charley was the reverse. Impulsive and hasty, he took no thought of consequences.

So when he took his turn at prospecting Andy and Harry were in a state of suspense, until his signal whistle sounded on the return.

One night it came hours later than usual, and both were half wild with anxiety. But as was wilder than either, and exhibited a handful of small nuggets of almost pure gold.

Andy instantly shared his excitement, and next day went forth along, but took fortune empty handed. Charley had found the gold in a tiny pool, but had searched the crevice to its source, without finding another particle.

All were awfully disappointed.

Next day, Charley sat and looked at the gold a long time; then, as if some thought had suddenly occurred to him, he sprang up, and slinging his rifle across his back, started up the slope.

He made his way directly to the spot where the spring bubbled out from beneath a wave of vines, at the foot of a huge wall of rock. For several minutes he stood looking keenly at it, then stooping, cuddled them in his hand and drew them to one side, revealing an opening large enough to admit a child.

A satisfied "I thought so," then, it being light, he stepped boldly in, finding room to walk easily beside the stream. It was no cave, as Charley had expected, for only a rod or so had he come out into another nothcher-like pastures by their importuning, and forced to "do society work," as he termed playing the agreeable to their friends.

Jack was a fine specimen of physical beauty, and his six feet of brawn and muscle, curly auburn hair and laughing blue eyes caused more than one fair girl to cast admiring glances in his direction. He was elegantly indifferent to the wiles of coquetry, and secretly held to the theory that love was a myth, and that courtship was nothing more nor less than a fine preface to a tiresome book.

Coolly attired in a blue flannel suit, with his feet against a tree in the back-yard, he "cuddled" last novel in his hands, and "cuddle" it he did, for Miss Eva and Jack Spratt was whiling away a quiet afternoon in solid satisfaction.

"I wonder how it would be to love some girl desperately," he mused. "Love has been a myth to me, and I'm the world—make her happiness the sole object of my life—work hard for her—convince that she loved me devotedly, and all that sort of rot—pretty, too, she is, and I never found anything of much consequence in dangling after a giddy girl. These and similar thoughts trooped lazily through his brain, and it occurred to him that he had never yet seriously lost his love any one. The idea of a flirtation had been a pastime to him, and yet he knew that such affairs were every-day events.

"I'll try it at the first opportunity," was his final conclusion.

As he took his hat and was leaving the house for an evening stroll, Maud said to him:

"Jack, will you do me a favor?

"Well, it depends upon in the world that I would rather do than another, it is to do my sister Maude's favor," he replied, putting his thumbs in the arm-holes of his vest and looking down into her upturned face with a comical smile.

"No joking, Jack! Will you, really?

"Let me see," he said, reflectively, looking over her head. "I believed I was to see a man this evening—and—and then I've an engagement with that Crowley fellow to be a professional game of—

"O, yes" interrupted Maud, disgusted. "I suppose you will. I have a wonderful amount of business on hand just because I want you to do something for me."

"Now, don't try to make yourself believe I'm such a bad sort of a fellow, Maud sis, as it like buying a paper of pins, or anything of that kind.

"Well?

"Hair pins?

"No.

"Taffy?

"No.

"Ala, I have it now!

"Well, what is it?

"Caramels?

"No, again. Now, look here, Jack! I really do want you to grant me a little favor, and it is delightfully easy, and then you will enjoy it, too."

"Well, out with it, pump," said Jack, resignedly.

"But will you do it?

"How can I say whether I can or not, when I don't know what it is.

"But I know you can.

"Is it anything bad?

"Of course it isn't!" cried Maud, stamping her foot impatiently.

"What's the matter with your foot, sis?

"Jack, I think you are just as mean as you can be. Never mind! I'll manage to get out to make you some chocolate cake, some of these days, and you'll not get a mouthful of it.

"Now, see here, Maud, if you are going to treat me in this such barbarous fashion, and make me wish I had never been born, I'll do anything you wish, even to telling Walter Herrick that you love him to distraction.

"Was a moment you are!" cried Maud, in her vexation, as she turned her head to speak of gold was everywhere.

Jack, for the last time, will you?

"For the first time—yes.

"Well, I'm like Eva and Mabel Lynn are to spend the evening with us, and I want you to come in by half-past 8 to escort them home. You will, won't you?

"And so I will," quoth my sacred word and honor." And, leaving a kiss upon Maud's Walter's sake," he laughed good-naturedly and departed.

"So, I'm to walk pretty Eva Lynn and her cunning little tw n sister Mabel home this evening, quoth Jack, as he sauntered up-street. "Sisters are nothing but antiquated nuisances, no matter how you look at them!"

Jack kept his promise. He had successfully turned himself away from a giddy or fully turn himself away from a giddy or fullness, and had equally good fortune in making witty replies to the Misses Lynn. Mabel, as they lent on his arms en route to the Lynn residence. He was in the spirits, and accepted their invitation to sit a few minutes upon the veranda before returning. Comfortably seated, the two talked and laughed and enjoyed themselves thoroughly.

"I've had a pitcher of lemonade in the refrigerator all the afternoon, Jack. Would you like some of it?" said Eva.

"I was just thinking I would," remarked Jack.

"Yes, you in and get it," urged Mabel, And her sister disappeared in the gloom of the hallway.

An idea shot athwart the brain of Jack Spratt. He smiled to himself. "It is a pity to do it," he thought, "and I'll do it."

"Why so silent, Jack?" inquired Mabel, who motioned Jack to be suddenly quiet.

"Miss Mabel, perhaps you will be surprised at my thoughts," he replied with a sigh that seemed to be wrung from him by the cause of my silence, I will tell you. But I do not expect you to believe it, for I do not be startled—listen to my words. I know I have not paid you marked attention, but I have placed you in my life as my heart's ideal. I love you passionately! I adore you! Will always love you! My secret is yours. My soul's fate is in your keeping!

Mabel Lynn was surprised, so much so that she could only say, "Oh, Jack!"

"There! I know I would say something I regret not but you see, Mabel," he pleaded, "I don't know what I've said that's wrong. I only know that I have spoken my love and asked you to make me the happiest man on earth."

Somehow Jack's hand found hers, and then, after a momentary silence, she said: "This is so sudden, and—and—I don't know—"

"My darling, leave not me in suspense—just one little word is all I crave, and I know that you say; and if the future brings with it a different view of me, you may use my remains back."

"Jack—I am yours!"

Before the interest could be sealed by the conventional kiss, Eva came along the hall with several clinking glasses and the lemonade.

"So ho!" cried Eva, "you two seem to have been telling secrets in my absence; but my lemonade is much nicer than any gossiping tale. Mabel have been whispering, I'll warrant."

The lemonade was pronounced a fine mixture by Mr. Spratt, much to its maker's satisfaction. Mabel and her sister would remain until Jack went away, and was forcibly anxious to be alone. Her little brain was in a whirl, and fearing if she remained she would betray her secret inadvertently, she excused herself and entered the house.

"What were you two whispering about while I was away, I'd just like to know?" queried Eva, with piquant curiosity.

"I was asking her what you thought of me," replied Sir Jack, laughing. "I wished to have the way into your good graces, Eva."

He stopped short. He had come face to face with another inspiration.

"I rather like this; then why not more of it?" is his thought.

"And what, Mr. Spratt?"

"It is this, Miss Eva," he said, in a low, earnest tone, "that I have learned to love you with all my heart."

He took her hand and held it firmly.

"Yes, Eva, my heart and soul are filled with you every hour in the day, and at night my pillow is hundred times wet from tears I have shed over your cruelty to me—you in vain, and now I must have my fate. My darling, let me place you to home—that you will be mine—mine forever!"

"Your wife!" ejaculated the astonished girl.

"Eva, Eva! can you not realize that my life is wrapped in your love? I ask for bare—pity me," Jack went on, with earnest in his tones. "Will you—can you love me?

"Jack, this is very sudden, I—I—I don't know what to say—I—I—

"Say that you love me, Eva! Say that you love me! Say that you love me!

"I don't know—I don't know—I don't know!

"Hush! I hear Mabel coming, and I dare not see you. Tomorrow I will see you, and you will know my fate. Good-bye, Eva! Good-bye!"

Mabel, who had gone back to be suddenly quiet.

"Miss Mabel, perhaps you will be surprised at my thoughts," he replied with a sigh that seemed to be wrung from him by the cause of my silence, I will tell you. But I do not expect you to believe it, for I do not be startled—listen to my words. I know I have not paid you marked attention, but I have placed you in my life as my heart's ideal. I love you passionately! I adore you! I will always love you! My secret is yours. My soul's fate is in your keeping!

"Jack!"

"Jack, I know I would say something I regret not but you see, Mabel," he pleaded, "I don't know what I've said that's wrong. I only know that I have spoken my love and asked you to make me the happiest man on earth."

The Tariff and a Bushel of Wheat.

At present prices it does not pay the farmer to raise wheat. The population of the country is steadily increasing and making imperious demands for cheap food. An American does not bring the low prices it should. What is the reason? The wheat raiser in the western states gets perhaps 40 cents a bushel for his wheat. The price to the consumer is rarely less than $1 a bushel. What is needed is a means of bringing consumer and producer together at a less cost than 60 cents per bushel. Then the farmer could get better prices and the consumer could get cheaper food. Several causes combine to create this enormous disparity between these two prices, and it is to them we must look to remedy the evil.

To begin at the beginning—the farmer has to pay an increase of at least one third on his tools in the shape of a protective duty; if he wants to borrow money to improve his farm he must pay at least 1 per cent per month—in many cases 2 per cent—while his average income is but 3 per cent per annum; whatever provisions and other necessaries he buys are loaded with their proper percentage of protective duty, as well as paying carrier's and railroad every portion of which has been increased in cost by the same protective duty on its iron and materials used in building cars and laying road beds, as well as higher wages to mechanics caused by increased cost of living under protection; when he purchases seeds he must pay an increased price for the privilege of being protected against cheap seeds from any other country; in short, he pays for the privilege of living inside a tariff wall.

Having raised his crop at an increased expense through the aid of protection, he is in shape to realize some of its benefits. In Liverpool wheat may be selling for $1 a bushel. Visions of wealth float before him. But the trouble is to get it to Liverpool. The vast network of railroads which a generous congress has paid for now come to his aid. Their cost has probably been 50 per cent higher because the country must be protected. Of course, they cannot afford to carry his wheat for prime cost of transportation, even though liberal Congresses were showered upon them in the shape of land grants. Dividends must be earned, and even if the stock has been so watered that it bears no resemblance to original cost, the farmer will not object to pay liberally for transportation towards that dollar a bushel.

Then come the elevators, built at an increased expense just like the farmer's tools and the railroads. Of course, storage must be paid for, and of course the farmer's wheat is well able to pay for it, for isn't there a dollar a bushel to be made?

The vessel charges are very modest. No farmer can complain of them, especially when he remembers they are necessary to get his wheat to Liverpool; yet these same vessels, if American, have to pay their share of the protection he enjoys, and so he pays a little more.

Board of trade men are needed to buy and sell his wheat, too. Surely no farmer in his senses would expect them to work for nothing, any more than he would expect the railroad, elevator and vessel men to do so. Their cost of living, thanks to the duty on clothing and other necessaries, including rent, is much larger than if they had to compete with the pauper labor of Europe, and the farmer must see that their standard of life is kept up on a liberal scale.

All the farmers' wheat does not go to Liverpool, yet his price is made there, and the consumer here must pay accordingly; still the farmer does not get the dollar a bushel which the consumer pays. There have been so many shrinkages on the road.

To abolish the protective tariff would decrease the prime cost of tools and other necessaries; to give him cheap money would relieve him to a wonderful degree and enable him to use more of it to advantage in improving his farm and raising better crops; his railroad, elevator and vessel charges could be correspondingly reduced by the abolition of the same protective tariff; and thus he could hope to receive more of the dollar a bushel he set out to raise his wheat for.

The abolition of the tariff would help the consumer not only in giving him the benefit of the bonteous crops of the country, but in enabling him to procure more of the necessaries of life from the producer, and this would in turn react upon the labor market and give him plenty of employment at living wages.

The only persons who would not be benefited would be landlords, money sharks, and the few protected monopolies which use their millions to create corners and rob the people.

Why should not the method be simplified?—Evening News.

TEN YEARS AGO, on December 26th, 1875, The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS was founded. It was the pioneer of low-priced journalism in the west. From the first the controlling conviction of its managers has been that a "cheap paper" should be a cheap only in price; that its news should be as fresh and complete, its editorial discussion as able, and its general tone and character as pure and healthful as its best and highest-priced contemporary. This has been its ideal. How well it has succeeded in the actual attainment of so high a standard is best evidenced by the fact that it now regularly prints and sells over 150,000 papers a day,—a larger circulation than that of all other Chicago dailies combined.

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is an INDEPENDENT newspaper. It is not partisan. Neither is it a neutral. It is a paper of positive opinion, expressed without fear or favor. It seeks the patronage of people who love counting more than party.

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is the only 2 cent paper in the west that is a member of the Associated Press. It prints ALL THE NEWS.

Sold by all news dealers, at two cents per copy. Mailed to any address, postage prepaid, for six dollars per year, or half a dollar per month. Address Victor F. Lawson, Publisher THE DAILY NEWS, 123 FIFTH AVE., CHICAGO, ILL.

THE CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS—8 pages, 64 columns—is the largest dollar weekly in America.

MIDDLE AGE.

When raised apples turn each beamed cheek
To beg a final pipeman from the rain—
When the first frost with pencil fine and true
Has touching of the leaves ere best begun—
When all the tumults of the spring are over,
And the enchanting summer smiles no more—
Then nature still can turn a fair, bright page
And blend all joys in the year's middle age.

To all an rustic joys of summer, spring,
The hazel copse can add its store of wealth.
The nests are empty, but the boldings gay
Now dream their core sweet dreams of love by by stealth.
The spring was fitful and the summer shy,
But autumn, in her mood of wondrous glee,
Ponders how she can make each day more fair,
So hangs a tender haze within the air.

And so in life, when on the fair white brow
The lovely tints of gray begin to show,
The heart throbs with a deep and tender love
That fond care years can never know.
We see our meetings mate in their glad spring,
Yet know their woes is not so grand a thing
As it will be when autumn's glory sheds
The rapture of all nature on their heads.

BY COACH ABOUT ENGLAND.

Scenery of the English Country—Passing Through the Villages.

I was glad to find myself in the morning leaving London for new and uninteresting districts of Lemington and passing out into the Warwick section on the top of a fast going four horse coach, bound into the English country and toward the old English towns of the west.

But Worcester and Hereford were still far away, and we had to think of our journey thither as part of our pleasure, so we stopped for an hour in a town, the guard was winding clear and merry blasts upon his horn, and every passer by was turning to see. It was on the high road and that the spleny old exhilaration of driving in this way overcame us. The day was cloudy and rather cold, a keen wind blew fresh in our faces, and the long far landscapes and slopes and fields were hidden in low rolling mists, although the air near by was clear. The country, which we could view well over the tall hedgerows from our high seats, looked dull, for there were no far shadows and patches of sunlight to see. The weather was every morning of this cloudy fashion, yet always midday the clouds broke and the afternoon fields would be bright with sun.

Through the whole drive we met few people upon the roads, no gentlefolk at all, only the drivers of carts, vans and traveling shows, and round canvas topped millers' wagons drawn by the largest and shaggiest of Clydesdale horses. The men we passed were of a red faced type, wearing corduroy trousers, tied tight around the leg with a string just below the knee, the nearest approach to the Knickerbockers of yore. Some of the oldest of these men touched their hats; all stared. There was little talking done by any of us. Each one sat trying to fasten these impressions of inside England and of the people upon his memory. The rattle of the horses' hoofs and the roll of the wheels filled the air with pleasant suggestions, and now and again the horn wound, and there was the excitement of getting through one of those villages where the people of this crowded island live huddled together like cattle in corrals or beauty hard to find.

We saw nowhere during our journey the village scene in the beauty which it possessed in Warwickshire. In the counties of Worcester and Hereford and part of Worcester the villages are built of stone or brick, new and old, mixed together, have their gardens and "walks and dab," or osiers and mud, as we should say, and they have thick, ivy thatched roofs and dormer windows with bright little panes, and behind them the walls, in many cases half by creeping vines or white rose bushes. Their little doors open directly on the street, and in the cottage windows, best of all, the finest pots of red and white geraniums. It is astonishing the many pleasure one may feel while one looks at these simple homes and forgets the life which must be led inside. They are large enough for two—but for ten!—Cor. New York Times.

The Capital of Mexico.

The city of Mexico, capital of the republic, with a population of about 250,000, as it well known, is situated on ground that was formerly an island in Lake Texcoco. The name is derived from Mexitli, the Aztec war god, in brief, the story of its origin runs thus: The Aztecs, while wandering about the country, met a rival tribe, the Collinans; being defeated in battle and conquered, they retreated to the valley of Mexico. An oracle had commanded them not to found a city until they had come to a spot where an eagle should be seen standing on a rock. They shortly after beheld, in their wanderings, an eagle perched on a cactus growing out of a rock; hence they founded a city, calling it Tenochtitlan—meaning, "cactus upon a rock." Under this name the city became the head of the empire of Anahuac. Hence on the national flag, as also on some of the coins, will be seen the Mexican eagle with a serpent in its beak, perched on a cactus protruding from a rock. The city has an elevation of 7,400 feet above sea level, and a mean temperature of 60 deg. Fahr.—Cor. New York Post.

An Chinese Bank Note.

The oldest bank note in existence is said to be one now preserved in the Asiatic museum at Petersburg. The date corresponds to 1399 B. C. It was issued by the Chinese government. As early as 2697 B. C. so called bank notes were current in China under the name of "flying money." This note bears the name of the Imperial bank, date and number of issue, and the signature of a mandarin, and contains even a list of the publishments to be inflicted for forgery of notes. This relic of 3,300 years ago was probably written by hand, as the earliest record of printing among the Mongolians was 160 A. D., when the use of wooden tablets was introduced into China.—New York Mail and Express.

How Indians Poison Their Arrows.

It was a long time before Friday came, and I began to think he was going to disregard my summons, and was getting angry, when he suddenly put in an appearance. I explained to him what I wished to know, and without the slightest hesitation he said to the venerable arrow maker:

"Tell my brother all about the poisoned arrows."

"Well," said the old man, "first we take a bloated yellow rattlesnake in August, when he is most poisonous, and tie him with a forked stick to a stake; then we tease him until he is in a great rage. This is done by passing a switch over his body from his head to his tail. When he threshes the ground with his body and his eyes grow bright and sparkle like diamonds, we kill a deer, antelope or some other small animal, and, tearing out the liver, throw it to the snake while it is warm and the blood still coursing through it. The reptile will strike it again and again and pretty soon it will begin to turn black. When he tires, the snake is teased again and he is induced to strike his fangs into the soft flesh until all the poison has been extracted from him and the liver is reeking with it. He is then killed and the liver lifted with a sharp pole, for so dangerous is it no one dare touch it. The liver is let lie for about an hour, when it will be almost jet black in its resin and smelly. Arrows are then brought and their iron heads pushed into the liver up to the shaft. They are left sticking there for about one hour and a half, when they are withdrawn and dried in the sun. A thin glistening yellow scum adheres to the arrow, and if it lost so much as touches your flesh it is certain to poison it to death."

I asked if Indians still used poisoned arrows. "No," he replied, "no man, Indian or white man, for years past has been shot with these arrows, and they are no longer made."—Omaha Republican.

A Blow on the Nose.

It has been said that the hurts suffered in pugilism are particularly severe, and that few pains equal the pain resulting from a blow of the fist squarely and forcibly delivered upon the nose. An incident which goes to support this allegation is reported from Paris. A lion tamer, in one of the Boulevard shows, was set upon by a powerful and irritable old lion, whose cage he had entered, according to habit in the course of an entertainment. The beast made his attack without warning or particular cause, and in an instant the man was upon his back, between the lion's paws. The spectators screamed, thinking it was the end of the lion tamer; but, like a flash, he was upon his feet, and striking out with his right, in accurate pugilistic style, landed his fist upon the lion's nose, with a spat that was heard all over the place. The lion whooped and sneezed and backed away, shaking his head and shutting his eyes as if Maryland Prohibitionists Assemble in Convention and Nominate a Ticket.

At the State convention of the Maryland Prohibitionists, in session at Cambden, a plank was adopted expressing the belief that the manufacture, importation, and sale of alcoholic beverages should be prohibited, and that prohibition can only be made effective by statutory enactment, national in scope and vitalized by a political party pledged to the enforcement of the law. It suggested that men who sell votes or corrupt voters shall be forever disfranchised; that wageworkers should be protected by laws self-acting which prevent the importation of foreign pauper labor; the enactment of laws providing for arbitration in cases where capital and labor are in conflict, and adequate appropriations for the inmates of labor statistics; favors laws by-ond the health and safety of those engaged in mining, to give mechanics and laborers a first lien on the products of their labor; and vitalized by a political party pledged to the enforcement of the law. The convention nominated the following ticket: For Governor, Samuel Ged Baldwin, of Baltimore; for Attorney General, James Pollard, of Baltimore; for Comptroller, Thomas E Wright, of Cambridge.

ANARCHISTS DOOMED.

The Illinois Supreme Court Said to Have Agreed Adversely to the Haymarket Assassins—A Unanimous Decision Not to Grant the Condemned Men a New Trial.

Ottawa (Ill.) special of Wednesday printed the following dispatch from Galesburg:

Justice A. M. Craig, of the Illinois Supreme Court, who is now spending a few weeks at the seat of his boyhood home, has the authority to have dropped, prior to his departure, or soon after his return, the case of our business men, remarks to the effect that the Supreme Court would not grant a new trial in the Haymarket anarchists case. Judge Craig. It is stated that in this conversation he said that the decision of the court would be agreed by the Supreme Court of the United States, that the law of the case is final, and that the labor of writing an opinion to that effect was entrusted to Mr. Justice Harlan, and was in progress at that time. It could not be learned whether Justice Harlan was writing the opinion, or if Judge Craig in his conversation with the court was quite transparent in its opinion. The decision will be kept a secret until the opening of the September term, which will be on the first Tuesday in that month.

The Chicago Boodler Trial.

A CHICAGO dispatch of Thursday says: "In the great omnibus boodle trial the defense rested yesterday. The State introduced no rebutting evidence, for the reason that there was nothing to rebut. Arguments were then made by Assistant State's Attorney Walker for the prosecution and Colonel Dan Rhodes for the defense. In the course of Mr. Walker's speech he denounced Wren as 'the most contemptible witness of the gang,' and as a 'perjurer.' Wren jumped to his feet and called Walker a liar, repeating the term several times, while Walker reiterated his characterization of the big boodler as a perjurer. The Court finally succeeded in suppressing Wren, who left the room in a rage."

The Election in Utah.

The tragedy grew out of a feud of several months' standing between Mullen and his assailants.

AT Jersey City, Joseph Schlimmer, aged 24, shot his wife Lillie, 16 years of age. It had been agreed that the couple should not live together for two years, but the murderer had endeavored to persuade the girl-wife to leave her parents' home. Failing in this, he lay in wait in the street with her mother and grandmother, shot her dead, and fled.

THE WESTERN STATES.

NEWS comes by telegraph from New Mexico of a terrible accident on the Atlantic and Pacific Road. As a freight train was approaching Peralta Canyon, the engine plunged at full speed into an arroya, the bridge over which had burned. The freight cars piled up on top of the engine, making a terrible wreck. A Mexican named Sparks was instantly killed; Jack Reilly, conductor, and George Gibson, brakeman, were fatally injured. Twenty-two cars, with their contents, and one of the finest engines on the road are a total wreck, involving a loss to the company of $40,000.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY PETERS has filed a suit in behalf of Salt Lake City to disincorporate the Mormon Church and wind up its business. He asks that the property, amounting to $6,000,000, be escheated to the common school fund.

THE boodlers' trial at Chicago reached a dramatic climax Friday afternoon when Mr. Madden, the Chairman of the present Board of Commissioners of Cook County, who was also Chairman of last year's Board, arose and confessed his guilt. Mr. Ehlem throws himself on the mercy of the Court, preferring to take his chance of a plea of guilty and a sentence of punishment fixed by the Judge rather than to take the chance of the Court's mercy if he should plead guilty and a jury verdict fixing the penalty. Says a Chicago dispatch: "The testimony for the State was all in. "As far as we know now, the State rests," said Mr. Grinnell. "There may be a few trifling points we don't think of now, and we would therefore reserve our right to put them before the defense opens." "All right, Mr. Grinnell," said the court. THREE columns of our inside pages this week are devoted to the temperance cause.

Home Knowledge for August is a very interesting number. It contains "The Night Air Cure;" "Music in the Home;" "Kindergarts n?" "How Not to be a Wall Flower;" "Patent Wrongs;" "Decay of Bodily Strength in Towns;" "The Virtues of Coffee;" and many other choice articles.

Those who want cheap land can have a choice of a large quantity of government land yet. There are still 9000,000 acres of public land in Colorado, 12,000,000 in Arizona, 30,000,000 in California, 49,000,0000 in Dakota, 7,000,000 in Florida, 40,000,000 in Idaho, 7,000,000 in Minnesota, 41,000,000 in Utah, 20,000 in Washington Territory and some millions of acres in other states and territories.

Mr. George W. Childs, a sound republican, says: "Unquestionably Mr. Cleveland's strongest hold upon the good will of the people arises out of the fact that he does nothing to 'curry favor,' but proceeds right along in the straight path of duty, without regard to whether it will make votes for him or lose them. Undoubtedly he prefers to be right, whether president or not; but this seems to be the way, also, to continuance in office."

The terrible railway disaster, at Chatsworth on the 11th, is the most terrible in its list of killed and seriously wounded the world has ever known. The number of lives lost in the greatest railway disasters of the past are as follows: At Versailles, France, May 8, 1842, loss of life 53; Burlington, N. J., August 29, 1854, killed 21; Mons, Belgium, June, 1858, 21 killed; St. Hilaire, Canada, June 29, 1864, 83 killed; near Erie, Pa., December 18, 1867, 41 burned to death; Care's Rock, N. Y., April 14, 1868, 26 killed; Abergele, Wales, August 29, 1868, 33 burned to death; Revere, Boston and Portland road, Aug. 26, 1871, 20 killed; Belleville, Canada, June 22, 1872, 30 killed; Ashtabula, Ohio, December 22, 1876, 100 perished by drowning, fire and exposure to cold; Tay bridge, Scotland, Dec. 28, 1879, 74 lives lost. In this disaster 118 lost their lives and about 200 were injured.

A Ring to be Broken.

The work of administrative reform goes on at Washington, not noisily but steadily and earnestly. The latest matter which is attracting wide attention is the statement in detail of affairs of the Pacific railroads, being prepared by Maj. Reddington with a view of prosecution, both criminal and civil, of directors of these companies. It is a well known fact that the government and the Central and Union Pacific roads have been plundered outright by the directors of those roads out of about $75,000,000. It is also a fact that all this money could be recovered if provided the government takes proper action, and it is now pretty well known that it intends doing so, and when the proper time arrives Maj. Reddington will produce the name of the man who acted as paymaster for Huntington, and his agent Sherril, for services performed in Washington, or in other words, in "explaining" to members their duty regarding the Pacific roads. There is sufficient evidence in Huntington's testimony on which to base indictments of Huntington and most of his associates, in the judgment of good lawyers, but when the Pacific railroad commissioners have completed their report, after completing their investigations, it is believed there will be material enough to bring a case against every member of the Pacific railroad ring. The indications are that the Cleveland administration will push the prosecution.—Grand Rapids Democrat.

Capt. D. W. Lockwood, United States engineer, submits the following estimates for river and harbor improvements for the next fiscal year: Michigan City harbor, Indiana, $250,000; South Haven harbor, Mich., $40,000; St Joseph harbor, Mich., $41,000; Saugatuck harbor, Mich., $5,000; Black Lake harbor, Mich., $15,000; Grand Haven harbor, Mich., $150,000; Muskegon harbor, Mich., $100,000; White River harbor, Mich., $50,000; Pentwater harbor, Mich., $4,000; Lindington harbor, Mich., $25,000; Manistee harbor, Mich., $50,000; harbor of refuge, Portage Lake, Mich., $150,000; Frankfort harbor, Mich., $50,000. Charlevoix harbor and entrance to Pine Lake, $50,000. This aggregates nearly $1,000,000 for Michigan the coming year.

HOW MEN LIVE AND DIE.

Peculiarities of the World's Records of Mortality—Vital Statistics.

Scarcely a day passes when Dr. John T. Nagle, deputy registrar of vital statistics, does not receive a bulletin or pamphlet showing the state of public health in some more or less remote country. In return he sends information to almost every civilized government on earth. His little office in Most street is filled with ebooks documents, written in English, German, French, Portuguese, Spanish, Russian, Roumanian, Danish, Swedish, Hungarian, Italian and other tongues. Complicated tables come in avalanches from Great Britain and her colonies in all quarters of the globe. A report from Calcutta shows that the "Amalgamated Jashee and tank committee" met four times during the first quarter of the fiscal year 1884-5. There is a fabulous suggestion about the title of this useful body which is not diminished by the statement that two of their meetings were held out of doors.

Of all the European countries Roumania is the most industrious in the manufacture of statistics. She sends out every year dozens of volumes bound in gaily colored paper, each bearing the imprint of the government bureau which issued it. Finland is determined that no one shall be kept in doubt as to her exact condition. In vast deserts of ten and twelve syllable words is an occasional oasis of French, which gives a general idea of what the Finish statistician is trying to get at. Private bundle asylums are "yleisten sairaluonoeisin isarerto osatoksa," and public madhouses "hallituksohdoksessa." Official reports from Servia are printed in letters which lead a narrow escape from being Greek. Consonants, particularly "h" and "j," are strewn with an unsparing hand through the Swedish compilation. The Latin names of diseases are given in connection with the Swedish, and a reader who pays his money may take his choice, "Ofvel-hjernhinneinflammation" is a fashionable lung disease, and "fyllerigrad smakap" is delirium tremens. Protracted drinking brings a Swede to alkoholoso yldoma, and a Dane to lasandivinsgrydom. When a Stockholm citizen succumbs to old age the doctor writes "olderdomssvagning" on the death certificate, and everybody knows what the trouble was. Neatly printed and voluminous reports come from Central and South America. Venezuela, Colombia and the Argentine Republic issue documents in numerous Spanish. Little Guatemala's official pamphlets have gorgeous red borders.

The unspeakable Turk has a soul above figures, and never takes the pains to find out the sanitary condition of his empire. There is a story of a United States consul in a Turkish town who asked the local pasha for estimates of the population. In a characteristic reply, beginning "Oh, my lamb!" the pasha said that he had dwelt for forty years in the city, yet he had never counted the houses over the people that dwelt therein. He failed to see why any man should seek after information not vouchsafed by the wisdom of Allah.

Several years ago Dr. Nagle says reports from China and Japan were printed in the vernacular. Now these interesting countries send to barbarian lands hard facts in good English. The Celestial empire shows a weakness for brilliant yellow covers, like those of an old time dime novel. But the metrical reports of the Chinese cities, garnished with meteorological tables and temperature charts that look like maps of a yacht race, contain matter more interesting than anything in yellow covered fiction. Dr. A. Henry, treating of the health of Ichang, says that although the scenery is majestic and imposing, the filthy habits of the natives give to the place unhealthy, malodorous and unesthetic features. The people are strong, but drink hard and smoke much opium. They never bathe in water, but build fires in the open air and stand where the smoke will envelop their naked bodies. There are strong prejudices against European physicians and post mortem examinations. Heat apoplexy, called hi sun, kills many Chinamen. A native of Cheklang said that in his province sunstrokes were unknown, although people often died from drinking too much cold water. At Soochow sudden alternations of cold and heat caused agues and bowel complaints. It was given out that the god of pestilence had descended, and people, discarding doctors and drugs, crowded the temples, entirely neglecting treatment. There was an alarming mortality among the hens at Hankow. They were suddenly seized with fits and died at once. At Shanghai an old woman went from house to house, where people were ill, to drive away devils. The incredible film in which the lower class Chinese live, their dense ignorance and utter carelessness cause frequent epidemics, and make the work of relief exceedingly difficult.—New York Mail and Express.

"Sermons and Soda Water."

The history of the search for a specific remedy for alcoholic excess is the story of a series of melancholy failures, like the search for the philosopher's stone or the invention of the flying machine. Thackeray presents one of his characters in the act of irrigating his interior with small beer after an excess of punch at Vauxhall, in the Waterloo year, declaring that at that period soda water was unknown. Byron, however, who survived Waterloo only nine years, was familiar with the more modern remedy, and recommends "sermons and soda water" the day after. To this simple prescription was afterward added that of red herring, perhaps as a provocative to more drinking. Later in the nineteenth century potash has superseded those old fashioned palliatives, while many topers pin their faith to private prescriptions of their own.—The Argonaut.

A Giant Crystal.

At the royal public exhibition at Manchester a crystal of alum, believed to be the largest ever made, is on view. It stands twelve feet high, and is about six feet in diameter. The alum is said to be of the finest quality.—Cassell's Magazine.

AROUND THE COUNTY.

Eveline.

We are still without any rain, and roads are terrible dusty.

Reports are to the effect that the sick of our town are convalescent.

Mrs. Ann Jarman, wife of Mr. E. G. Jarman passed quietly away from this life at her home in this township last Thursday morning, of paralysis. Mrs. Jarman was born in London, England, October 18th, 1838. In April, 1858, she sailed for this country with an uncle and aunt settling at Oberlin, Lorain Co., Ohio, where she lived for a number of years. December 8th, 1864, she was married to E. G. Jarman, her present husband. In October, 1868, she with husband and two sons, came to Charlevoix county and settled on a homestead in Eveline, and suffered the many hardships of the pioneer life. May 30th, 1874, the family went back to Lorain Co. Ohio, and lived until March 25th, 1881, when they returned to this township again, where they reside. Mrs. Jarman had been failing in health for the past year and a half, and about two weeks ago she had a stroke of paralysis from which she never recovered. The funeral services were held in the Mountain school house Sunday morning, conducted by Rev. John Blake, of South Arm, and the remains were interred in the Charlevoix cemetery. Deceased leaves a husband, three sons and two daughters.

Olsen was a Swede, and has been in this country but a short time. The body has not yet been recovered.

The "Chestnut" Idiot.

There is one man on my list who never would be missed, and that's the man who shouts "chestnuts" every time a man tells a story, or even when he tells a quotation. In the first place the man who says "chestnuts" is generally a fellow who never tells a story himself, or, if he does, it is something from a way back in the twilight of fable. Now, sleeping is a chestnut, and so is eating and thinking, but they're good all the same. Shakspere is a chestnut, and so is Dickens and Lytton, but these fellows who yell it at them don't do anything so good. The old things are good and sound; they've been tried. The chestnut idiot yells his favorite word even when a man tells something brand new, and in this displays an impertinence and a desire to be considered ahead of his fellows, which are despicable characteristics, and calculated to destroy all pleasure in social intercourse.—Ben Finney in Globe-Democrat.

It takes a good deal of hard digging to clear away mortgages.

SWISS LANDSLIPS.

The Frequent Destruction of Villages by the Gigantic Landslides.

Many of the Swiss villages exist almost on sufferance. The avalanche of snow or the avalanche of earth may at any moment sweep them away, or, what is equally ruinous, overwhelm them with the debris of the mountain at the foot of or on which they are built. In not a few cases the landslip is so slow in its progress that it is only a question of time when the final catastrophe will be precipitated. At Roc Rouge, in the Tarantaise, for example, the side of the mountain is probably overwhelming the village of Miroir. In most cases, however, the calamity is sudden and unexpected.

Such an instance is supplied by the fall of the Rossberg, a well known mountain 5,000 feet high, situated just behind the better known and loftier Rigi. In 1806, after a very rainy season, a large portion of the mountain, consisting of beds of hard sandstone and pudding stone, resting on soft sandy layers, suddenly swept across the valley of Goldau, burying four villages, comprising over 300 houses, nearly 500 inhabitants and more than 85 square miles of fertile land. In 1829 a mass of debris slid into the valley of the Tiber, which, dammed back by the obstruction, overflowed the village of San Stefano to the depth of 50 feet, until the drowned inhabitants were relieved by means of a hastily constructed canal. Another example of a disastrous landslip is that in which, by the sliding of a portion of Monte Como, the entire village of Plurs, with 1,430 inhabitants, was in 1618 overwhelmed. For several days before the catastrophe masses of rock had become detached from the mountain, and numerous issues were observed to form on the mountain sides. But the people regarded the warnings, and were in a few minutes buried with all their possessions beneath sixty feet of rock and earth. All attempts to penetrate the mass proved fruitless, and no trace of the town has since been seen. The earth which entombed it now forms the rich and luxuriant forest of chestnuts, but the original name still survives in the little village of Piuro, or Plurs.

It may almost be said that these catastrophes are so frequent that history preserves the memory of only the most disastrous. Such a one was that by which the village of Elm was overwhelmed only a few years ago. At that time the place contained fifty houses and nearly 350 inhabitants, most of them children and old people. Nearly half of them were killed, while most of the surviving houses were altogether crushed or buried beneath the debris from that portion of the Tschingel Alps, which broke away from its parent mountain. Altogether, though the Elm catastrophe was in the loss of life and property, of less magnitude than those of which Plurs and Goldau, it is doubtful whether it did not, in the amount of rubbish shot from the mountain side, surpass both of these gigantic landslides. The Swiss geologists who visited the spot immediately after the disaster calculated that, at the lowest estimate, the contents of the slip measured 10,000,000 cubic meters. What a vast amount of material this pile contains may be grasped by a simple illustration. Zurich is a city of 76,000 inhabitants. Yet in the debris shot from the side of the Tschingel Alp there was stone enough to build two Zurichs. Some of the blocks are hundred 300 cubic feet in bulk. In the village of Elm. One is estimated to weigh 5,000 tons, and as these giant masses were precipitated from a height of 2,000 feet the irresistible force with which they fell on the doomed villages can easily be imagined.—London Standard.

Mrs. Langtry Not the First.

Evidence continues to pour in showing that whoever made the statement that Mrs. Langtry was the first American to become a citizen of this country was quite far from the facts. Judge Thomas Moran, of Chicago, the associate judge of the appellate court, says that his mother, a native of Ireland and subject of Great Britain, took out papers and became a naturalized citizen of New York city as far back as 1836 or 1837. He says that prior to the adoption of the revised statutes, about 1830, an alien could not inherit or hold title to land in New York. "My mother," he said, "came here as a child, and her father acquired property in New York. It was probably to enable her to enjoy her right and title on this that she became naturalized. Very likely many other ladies in a similar position in the original states and colonies did the very same thing, and imagine the occurrence is much less rare than the papers think. Until the legislature of the aforesaid states changed the law it had to be done."—New York Sun.

City Laundrymen's Wages.

Laundrymen in cities make big wages, for the work of washing is one in which there is less competition than in most others. With steam the work is done more perfectly and quickly than is possible without, and involves less severe labor than many other positions much more sought after. It is very strange that Chinamen have been allowed to take the work in this way. It is not altogether the cheapness of their labor, but rather the fact that only recognition of the fact that washing was a work that belonged rather to men than women. And yet, since men have put their hand to the washtub, there has been a wonderful increase in devices for saving labor. It is not now half so hard to make clothes clean as it used to be, but in starching and ironing there has been less improvement.—Boston Budget.

An American Room.

Mrs. Cleveland is fitting up a room at her Oakview mansion in antique style. She had made for it a rag carpet of a pattern formerly used by her grandmother. It is a combination of the "dish and mice" and "fancy stripe" varieties. The room will be a very unique affair, and Mrs. Cleveland intends to reproduce as nearly as possible a room such as served the purposes of parlor or drawing room in the last generation. There is to be a spinning wheel in one corner, the fireplace to be decorated with a pair of old fashioned andirons, and there will be all the paraphernalia which went to make up the interior decorations of a country parlor. It will be distinctively an American room.—Syracuse Journal.

The first bank ever established was located at Venice, about 1150, and was known as "The Chamber of Loans."

People Demand Protection—Patent Medicines.

What are they? A general thing here are prescriptions having been used with great success by old and well educated physicians, and by their use, and they are the wonder and demand of physicians and surgeons in the U. S., so much so, that physicians graduating at medical colleges are required to discontinue proprietary medicines, as through them the country doctor loses his most profitable practice. Proprietary or patent medicines, Dr. G. G. Green of Woodbury, N. J., advocates most emphatically, in order to obviate the risk that the sick and afflicted Americans, should not be imposed upon by patent medicines put out by inexperienced persons for aggrandisement or fame, and the employing of inexperienced or incompetent doctors by which means village and town is cursed, and undertakers, coffin makers and grave diggers, are enriched, experimenting with their patients and robbing them of money and health,—for the good of the afflicted that our government passed its mandate, by making laws to regulate the practice of medicine by better examiners, and thereby thoroughly educated physicians, and thereby shut the door against quacks of the profession, also forbidding the compounding of recipes of physicians and medicines, under examination and direction of experienced chemists and physicians appointed for that purpose by the government, so to prevent any accident or mistake, and to avoid most freely place the genius of Doctor's prescriptions, and the Great Physicians Prescriptions, and be the means of protection, and thereby save prejudice of the people, and good the community and institutions of medicines.—Copied from the Chicago Mail, Aug. 7, '87.

In Brief, and to the Point.

Dyspepsia is dreadful. Disordered liver is misery. Indigestion is a foe to good nature.

The human digestive apparatus is one of the most complicated and wonderful things in existence. It is easily put out of order.

Greasy food, tough food, sloppy food, bad cookery, mental worry, late hours, irregular habits, and many other things which ought not to be, have made the American people a nation of dyspeptics.

But Green's August Flower has done a wonderful work in reforming this sad business and making the American people so healthy that they can enjoy their meals and be happy.

Remember—No happiness without health. But Green's August Flower brings health and happiness to the dyspeptic. Ask your druggist for a bottle. Seventy-five cents.

Central Lake longs for glory as a manufacturing center, and a correspondent of the Breeze gives to the world the following: "Do you know that there are hundreds of thousands of feet of elegant cedar and black ash maple in the townships of Central Lake and Echo? Do you know that hundreds of thousands more have either been cut or logged and are now sold for $3.00 per M? Do you know what fabulous prices furniture men are willing to pay for just such timber? What is there to prevent some one from going into furniture manufacturing at Central Lake? We don't know.

Hillyer Bros., magicians and "specialists artistic," played two nights this week to light houses. Their witchcraft was generally good, and included a number of new tricks, but their "specialities" were mostly a lot of minstrelsy and low comedy that was positively disgusting. On Wednesday evening, the program was slightly changed, and Prof. Ferguson gave an exhibition of his power of control over the violin. By a combination of his mouth with the work on the violin he gave excellent imitations of a whole orchestra, a double whistle (as if two persons were whistling at once), of a locomotive leaving a depot, of a hog eating out of a trough, and various musical instruments, birds, animals and machinery. As a violin expert he is good, but the fine effects of his work are spoiled by his incessant self-praise.

At the Tuesday evening meeting a study of the Sunday school lesson will occupy a portion of the time. To all the above services non-attendants at other places of worship are heartily welcome.

Base Ball.

The Kalkaska Leader lashed itself into a terrible frenzy because the Charlevoix papers in criticising, told the truth in relation to the unjust decisions of umpire Darby in the second game between our base ball team and the Kalkaska club, and claimed that Darby intentionally and deliberately lost the game to Charlevoix, but Charlevoix does not win in that way. With an impartial umpire Charlevoix can thresh the ground with Kalkaska.

The game of ball played at Dixon Park Saturday afternoon between Petoskey and the home team, resulted in a victory for the visitors. Our boys seemed to grow tired from the start, and the Petoskey team walked away with them, winning with a score of 7 to 5. Some wretched playing was done by both clubs, but the errors seemed to be more disastrous to the home team. Charlevoix had the battery, Hoskins and Gage did not play. Barnett and Kraft filled the points, and did good work, but were poorly supported. Some handsome base stealing and made a tally. Marker, Petoskey's new pitcher acquitted himself creditably; his delivery being swift and puzzling. He was caught by Booth. Glenn Allen umpired with entire satisfaction. Following is the score:

Innings	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Charlevoix	0	0	0	0	0	1	0	4	5—5

Charlevoix played at Petoskey yesterday with the Petoskey team, which resulted in a victory for the Charlevoix by a score of 13 to 7. Petoskey presented the new battery Marker and Booth. Charlevoix played Hoskins and Gage. Glenn Allen umpired to the satisfaction of all. The score by innings was as follows:

Innings	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Charlevoix	0	0	0	0	1	0	4	8	0—13
Petoskey	0	1	0	2	1	0	1	2	0—7

Shipments.

The following are the shipments from the port of Charlevoix, reported for the week ending Wednesday evening:

Aug. 12—Schr. Oneida, 200 cords bark, French & Sutton to Chicago.

16—Schr. Eaglewing, 225,000 feet hardwood lumber, Gibson & Porter, to Chicago.

17—Schr. Addie, 30,000 feet hardwood lumber chair stuff, Pine Lake Lumber Co. to Michigan City.

17—Schr. Racine, 100 cords wood, 75 cords bark, W. H. Dewey to Chicago.

17—Schr. Stampede, 250,000 feet hardwood lumber, Pine Lake Lumber Co. to Chicago.

M. E. Church.

Let us be present at the Tuesday and Thursday meetings and make these closing weeks of the year memorable.

Teachers meet at parsonage on Friday evening.

Sunday morning, love feast at 9:30; preaching at 10:30. This will be the last communion this conference year. Be sure and come.

Yours etc. W. H. McCartney.

Announcement.—Prof. Ferguson, specialty artist and violinist, has consented to give our cornet band a benefit at opera hall next Tuesday night, proceeds to be applied toward the purchase of new uniforms, and our people are cordially solicited to lend their aid toward an object worthy of the proper encouragement it deserves. The boys are fortunate in securing his services, and it is hoped that this little enterprise will be a success.

An Appeal for the Episcopal Church at Charlevoix.

The church people at Charlevoix have secured eligible lots for a church edifice, on which they have paid nearly enough to release one of the lots so as to erect a church thereon.

Services have been held at intervals for two or three years, by the bishop, the general missionary, and other clergymen. These services have been principally in the summer.

There have been a number of baptisms, infant and adult, and lately I confirmed 14, nearly all adults.

The work has reached a stage where the erection of a chapel is necessary for its continuance and success.

The diocese is so missionary in its character, that we can afford but slight aid in church erection.

I have requested Mr. W. P. Brown, who has been very zealous in the work of the mission, to place the matter before members of the church, who, visiting here in the summer receive the benefit of the services, and to any others interested in the work of the church.

I shall be personally grateful for any aid. GEO. D. GILLESPIE, Bishop of Western Michigan.

Charlevoix, aug. 16, 1887.

This appeal was made last Sunday morning, at the hour of service. Any who were not present at church on Sunday, at the same time on Sunday next or to the Bank of Charlevoix at any time.

Why a Lake Turned Black.

The story of the poisoning of Dawbo lake, in Georgetown county, by a hail storm, as telegraphed, and which many persons supposed to be "shaky," has been corroborated in every particular by a prominent citizen of Georgetown, who has investigated the matter at the request of Gen. Grosly, chief of the weather service.

A dense mass of blackgum trees surrounds the lake on all sides. It is well known that the leaves of this tree are strongly impregnated with tannic acid. It has also been ascertained that the bottom of the lake contains a slight deposit of iron. The poisoning of the water, therefore, is thus explained. The hail storm bruised and filled the lake with the leaves and small branches of the trees. The tannic acid emanating from which, mingled with the iron and formed tannate of iron, causing the water to turn black as ink and bitter as quinine, and poisoning the fishes by thousands.

Some of the people living in the neighborhood believe that the condition of the lake is due to a judgment from God

MOURAD EFFENDI.

BY PERSIMAN.

Mourad Effendi did gloomy obey
The Kouza's precepts, and did so "Allah" pray
That some pious and faithful Musulman would
That so man should be necessary to his train,
And at the morning's early hour ere the day
And that the tribe of faithful would increase.

He was a farmer in Osmanlis's plain,
Where the Kouza's sheep and brother slain,
Such cases were not uncommon in such an land,
Where the cowl grief was heavy in his breast,
He always had kind words for the engrieved,
And never ceased to pray "God's will be done."

Mourad was said—some seventy years had gone
Since first the sun had shone upon his head,
Where were were three, his children were three score;
His sons were soldiers, and were in that fight
Decreed by the great Sultan to be right—
Loyal and true the Turkish arms they bore.

Then came the news from Plevna's battlefield
How many Turkish warriors had to yield,
The men from Moscow had the battle—
The blood of Turkish chivalry was spilled.
Mourad's six sons were in the battle killed
The weeping father said, "God's will be done."

Mourad went home hoping the news untrue;
Prayed unto heaven, then read the sacred through
Rebuked the dreaded of cruel Plevna's fight.
He saw in his sons all accounted for the fray—
Their swords were bright, their step and power gay;
As men who know they are in the right.

The morning sun that chose on Mourad's home Carried the news that his six sons were dead.
Mourad does nothing now but weep and pray
The sinless waits that long-promised peace;
He forgets that war will then forever cease;
Why should the sons of men smite their
Join we the Turk and to his prayer give
Turks manifest hold out that blessed peace
That war and all its evils now shall cease.
And let us pray that Mourad may be Bless'd with peace in time coming, but cease for praise
May in this world be universal peace.

THE TWO ROADS IN LIFE.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

"Can you take care of me and my horse to-night?"

"THEN, about fifty years ago, Mr. Otis Kinsman left his home in Albany for a business project in the West, the undertaking very different from our Western trips of to-day. Then, beyond the Mississippi was then the 'far West,' there were very few railroads, and it required not many days to bring the traveler beyond the bounds of canal, stage, and lake transportation, to a point where he must seek presently his further journeyings on horseback. To be exact, however, we must say that Mr. Kinsman purchased a horse and an equestrian outfit, at a town near the west end of Lake Erie, and that he had not gone beyond the region of Cincinnati, that place to a village forty miles distant, which we will call Springfield, there was a band of stage robbers; but the advice of good people at the town on the lake determined the traveler not to patronize it.

"The coach makes one trip a week each way," he was told, and unless you have next till day after to-morrow. It starts long before daylight, and gets in long after dark. Once I never got through till after midnight. It's a contrary road, with holes in places deep enough to hide a wheel. And then—

"Thank you, interrupted Mr. Kinsman. "Don't wrong me in that way, Samson! Did I not try my best to save you, before you attempted to be bail? After you were gone my wife broken-hearted to the grave, did I give you up? When the story came, did I believe come out, which naturally turned the few against you who were old friends, you know how I clinge to you, and how hard I tried to save you from bad company? And when your punishment was ended, who offered to take you into his employ, and help you to right the bad battle to gain honor and respect?"

"It was hopeless," said the sulky Larrabee.

"It was not hopeless!" The fine features of the speaker lighted up with enthusiasm, and the listener winced under it. "The fight could have been won then—and it shall be now, if you will give your heart to me. My—now, if you will give that one almost to the good and best of all, you shall purchase a very broad piece of wild land. On my return I shall stop here, and you shall go back with me. I have work for you to do; I remember your ability in business before you gave yourself away. Samson Larrabee, grading associates; close your disreputable business; trust to me, and I'll—give you my word!"

The speaker stopped abruptly; an ashen pallor overspread his face, and he sank back upon the bed. Large drops sprang up, beaded the water jug, and dashed part of its contents into the sufferer's face. Almost instantly the sufferer gained a reviving effect, he proceeded to loosen his collar, and as he did so, he observed between it and the shirt a stout woven belt, such as was used at that day to carry money. He felt with his thumb and finger at the edges, and found it already sewed and sealed in places, so though it contained both gold pieces and back notes.

Presently Mr. Kinsman opened his eyes, and began to be conscious, and sat up. He smiled as he saw the landlord standing before him with the water jug in his hand.

"Thank you, Samson," he said. "I'm nearly right again; you did the correct thing. You never know that I was subject to such attacks, although I began to have them long before you went away. Partial failure of the heart. The doctors say, caused by excitement. Don't worry, Sam. There's something more I wish to say, but it better not be said to-night. The morning or will talk again on that subject.

So they separated for the night.

Samson Larrabee was up betimes the next morning. He swept the bar and the hall, and gave directions that a good breakfast should be prepared for the guest. He amazed one of the loafing companions of the previous night, when he come in and asked for a drink, by telling him that he'd to go about his business. He was strangely restless. He tried to read; once he sat down and tried to write; once he went out to the front of the house, and leaned up to the window of the room where his guest slept, and knocked at the kitchen girl to go up and knock at the door of the chamber and say that breakfast would soon be ready.

The girl went up, and in a few moments returned with the report that she could get no answer from the room.

Then Larrabee went up. The girl, apprehensive of something wrong, had inquired on the stairs. The white face and tottering step of his master as he came down a-reel her.

"What's wrong with the gentleman, sir?" she asked. "Is he sick?"

"He is dead," said Larrabee, huskily.

The village where these events occurred, although having its full proportion of the lawless and the vicious, was yet more the home of law and order, and a thorough and searching investigation followed. Because of the bad character of Larrabee and his surroundings, it was prosecuted with an expectation of establishing his guilt; but it resulted in his complete vindication. A post-mortem examination disclosed such a condition of the heart of the deceased that the doctors declared that, in connection with the absence of any external marks of violence, and any other apparent cause, there could be no doubt that death had resulted suddenly from organic failure. The money-belt, containing a very large sum, was found upon the body. Samson Larrabee detailed to the Coroner's jury with exactness all the incidents of Mr. Kinsman's stay at his house that have been set down in this narrative, and such of what he said was corroborated by others. The verdict was in accordance with these facts. It added that it was the opinion of members of the family, who shortly came on from the East to claim the remains, that death had occurred in this verdict.

People at Sunderland who had been dissatisfied with this result on account of their feeling against Larrabee, stated out of the doors of the inn himself that they did the justice. He was, literally and emphatically, a changed man. The profound sorrow which he exhibited upon the sudden and startling death of Mr. Kinsman could not possibly be feigned. His testimony at the inquest, while given in such a way as to produce a decided impression of its truthfulness, was frequently interrupted by his great emotion. From that day he quit his evil ways, discontinued his business, and turned to hard and honest toil. As he grew in reputation and importance, place grew in his mind. The Sunday School the letter man within Samson Larrabee grew with it. Social position and influence in due proportion. He acquired wealth and the respect of all. He was a man of taste and usefulness; there was not a measure for the public improvement, or charitable, religious, or educational, that did not find in him a powerful supporter. His life was prolonged beyond the period of three-score and ten; and it is the simple truth to say that he died lamented by all who knew him or knew of him.

While the belief remained unshaken that a crime was committed upon that memorable night at Larrabee's inn, yet, in the minds of those who knew the integrity of the landlord's character before that time, there was a feeling that the whole truth had not been revealed. TRIANGULAR TRADE.

Every farmer as well as business man knows how convenient it sometimes is to make a three-cornered trade—that is, to make a "turn," as it is often called. Jones has a cow which Brown wants, but he doesn't feel like paying cash, and he has nothing to trade for it that Jones wants. In a few days he discovers that Thompson has a colt that Jones wants, and is willing to take in exchange for it one which it happens that Thompson does not want. He also discovers that Thompson does want the very pigs that he has to spare. So they strike up a three-cornered trade. Brown gets his cow, Jones his colt, and Thompson his pigs. It is an even trade all around, and all are satisfied.

Sometimes the three corners of the trade are not all fixed at the same time. Thompson has already bought the pigs and given his note for them. Brown trades the note to Jones for a cow. When Jones presents the note, Thompson does not happen to have it, but Jones takes it. A great many such trades are made in small villages. Here we can see them and grasp the whole situation.

A large part of our foreign trade is that way, and that is the reason the statistics of it are confusing to many people. It is in this shape or that shape that we trade the protective tariff goods in its work and does damage that we can see and grasp as a game by artificial people. A very interesting case in point is our trade with Brazil. It may be able to make it clear.

It is nearly all done in Brit ish ships, fully manned by Brit ish sailors. We take coffee in exchange for it, we take it to New York and unload its coffee, but it doesn't land on our shores. We manufactures and go back to Brazil. It loads up with manufactures and goes east and west to Liverpool. There it unloads its coffee, which goes consumed. The second leg of the journey is a long one, and the second 2,124,124, leaving an average rate of 1,062,062 tons for the year. In the first half of 1886 the production was 2,567,787 tons, leaving 1,283,893 tons for the close nominal. The increase of the rate of production from the first half of 1886 to the first half of 1890 was 1,292,894 tons, or 55 per cent. There are twelve furnaces under construction in the South of a capacity of 7,150 tons, and in other parts of the country of 1,440 tons per week. These furnaces, which will be at work in the latter part of 1891, will add to the production of 793,000 tons to the annual output, or 797 tons per week, and the South and 405,000 in other parts of the country. The total annual pig iron pig capacity will then be 1,190,000 tons, against 5,000,000 tons in 1886 and 4,041,785 the first half.

This striking progression illustrates the unhealthy tendency of high duties and the effort to inflate production by inflating prices. The cost of English iron at 37s. 7d. per ton, or $9.12 in gold, would be at current prices $6 to $13, but our irons are selling at prices which will meet even the duty, cost, and freight combined, and this finally ties the bill. If the duty were $10 higher the iron market would as easily cover that figure as the present.

THE COREAN RIP VAN WINKLE.

A Story Very Like Irving's Legend of the Catskills.

Was the legend of Rip Van Winkle wholly the creation of Washington Irving? Asks a writer in the New York Post, or did he put into such pleasing shape some story he had unearthed in his antiquarian researches? In Percival Lowell's charming book, "A Sketch of Corea," p. 145, I find this legend under the head of "Demon Worship":

"There lived once upon a time a certain well-to-do countryman, whose business took him into the woods. He was a teller of timber, and in pursuit of his work he often went far into the mountains. All Koreans are fond of fishing and this man was no exception to the rule; so, with his business excuse and his love as incentive, he would ramble on in the virgin forest. One day he wandered further than usual, and found himself at last some distance up the side of the mountain. Before him lay the peak seemingly close, and, under the impulse of this species of folly which urges men to go to the top of anything lofty, despite of their better judgment and repeated experiences that the end never justifies the means, he climbed it. The Huns.

The Huns were a people of Northern Asia, who, in the fifth century, invaded and conquered a great part of Europe. They were probably of Mongolian or Turkish stock, and the theory generally adopted by historians is that the Huns were directly descended from the Hiung-nu, whose ancient wars are so extensive and barren territory north of the great wall of China. They occupied so overran the Chinese about 200 B. C. that the great wall was built to keep them out. Their power was broken by subsequent wars with the Chinese, in the third century, under the "valiant Emperor Vou-ti," were successful. After this they were engaged in conflict with another powerful nomadic tribe of Northern Asia, and were so reduced in strength and shattered in an almost decisive battle that their numbers and power were greatly reduced. The survivors of the Caspian sea, where they settled and became known as the Wu-sun, were subjugated by the Chinese, and the remainder were driven south and settled on the Volga, in the vicinity of the Ural mountains they formed the river and established the territory of the Alani, which, in the fourth century, was seen by Vologa and Don Rivers, considered the greatest power in the world. They were themselves. In the following century, we find the combined tribes of the Huns to be well established in Hungary, and extended from the Baltic to the Danube. In the course of the fifth century, they were left of the conquered Gothic nations, and the Huns became the rulers in the bounds of the Roman Empire. The Huns settled on the banks of the Danube, and were soon after, in the year 395, involved in war with the Romans, and in the fifth century, under Attila, attained a high degree of power, and included or governed all the tribes from the Rhine to the Caspian. Attila also seized the territory south of the Danube, and threatened Italy, and Rome, in the existence of the Frankish Empire. The Franks called the Romans to their aid, and the famous battle of Mauriac was fought in June, 451, the bloodiest battle known in ancient history, in which the Romans and Franks, with the Visigoths, were so said to have lost 300,000 men. Attila was defeated in all respects, were appointed to wait upon the Emperor Vou-ti, and the countries serving three days, when it was relieved by another detachment.

Earned a Necklace.

As I am thinking of women, says a Paris letter, let me record what one of the sex once did to become the owner of a pearl necklace.

At the sale of the crown jewels the Princess Mathilde, the cousin of the Princess Nonjoint, one of the leaders in the Imperial Court, purchased a pearl his successor any male member of his family of a younger generation than himself of equal rank to leave as an heir. There are other possible results of life in the imperial kitchen that ambitious young women to regard admittance to its exclusive circle as highly desirable. When, any of the illegal occasions give birth to a son her status is legitimatized and she becomes a "princess of the blood" and a shareholder in the fortunes of her boy, and, if he should become an Emperor, or, has exceptional opportunities for a brilliant career.

All the young ladies who do not present the Emperor with a son or daughter by the time they are twenty-five years old are returned to the homes on their parents. Not all are sent back their characters. In fact, they are regarded as heroes of distinction and they are eagerly sought in marriage by gentlemen of their own rank. Of course they are all beautiful women, for no others are admitted to the Emperor's seraglio. Every three years the harem is in this sense weeded out, and the discarded ones are sold for other tender maidens in their teens to undergo the ordeal if the competitive examination, which appears to be as prominent a feature of the new selection as it was in the days of the Chinese civil service. Indeed, the manner of filling and maintaining the harem is not much more or very little since the time, over six hundred years ago, when Marco Polo wrote his graphic description of the domestic life of Kublai Khan, the Tartar, who, at that time, was magnificently adorned the very grounds in which the Emperor now lives and sales. Polo's figures were rather tall, but the number of court ladies was probably exceeded that of to-day, though Kwash Sun has an army of 5,000 eunuchs and a harem of 10,000.

Marco Polo wrote that Kublai Khan had four legitimate consorts and that the harem had not less than 10,000 persons attached to her court. Every year 100 of the most beautiful Tartar maidens who could be found were brought from far and near to the Khan's court, the committee of elderly ladies passed judgment on them. Those who were considered fit were then weeded, in all respects, were appointed to wait upon the Emperor Vou-ti, and the countries serving three days, when it was relieved by another detachment.

Earned a Necklace.

As I am thinking of women, says a Paris letter, let me record what one of the sex once did to become the owner of a pearl necklace.

China's Royal Harem.

The Emperor is by law entitled to seven concubines, and he may fill the harem with any number of "illegal" concubines. No degradation attaches to this status in the imperial palace. Indeed, it is a place to which any Manchu lady of the requisite rank is proud to aspire. If an inmate of the harem she may be one the mother of an emperor, as the harem doesn't descend to any particular son of the ruler, but it is the custom to name his successor any male member of his family of a younger generation than himself of equal rank to leave as an heir. FARM AND GARDEN.

DESIRABLE VARIETIES OF CELERY FOR MANY SECTIONS.

Among the Bees—Important Points About Fruits and Trees—A Simple and Inexpensive Plant Protector—The Use of Insecticides.

In many sections of the country it is not possible to grow cucumbers and other plants without the protection of frames or bottomless boxes of some kind, that protect the young plant from their insect enemies. These contrivances are often expensive and troublesome to adjust. The illustration represents a device vouched for by The American Agriculturist as an effective plant protector, easy to make and apply, and costing only the labor of constructing it.

PLANT PROTECTOR.

This inexpensive protector consists simply of a piece of card board or stiff paper of any kind, cut as seen in Fig. 2 in the illustration. When the ends are brought together and the slits, indicated in the illustration, made to interlock a cone, as seen in Fig. 1, is produced, which, when placed around the plant, furnishes a complete a protection against insects as the most expensive device.

Newly Set Trees.

Newly set trees require special care at this season, and many trees will doubtless die of neglect that with proper attention might thrive. Hot, dry weather kills many young trees. The ground around newly set trees ought to be frequently stirred and not allowed to become hard. If trees were not mulched at time of planting stir the soil and apply as a mulch some substance that will soak up and retain moisture. It does no good to water trees that are not mulched in dry weather. A mulch serves a double purpose: it retains moisture in the ground below it, and holds moisture in itself to be given up as the soil beneath it dries.

Transplanting Celery.

Select if possible the first day after a heavy rain for transplanting celery, when the ground is soft and yielding. Set the plants about the same level, with the ground around them, as they grew before transplanting. Remember, if set too high the plants will wilt; if set too low they will be smothered. Press the earth firmly around the plants at time of transplanting. Celery plants may be set between rows of early vegetables, such as onions, cabbage, and the like, when ground is limited. A usual plan is to set the plants in rows about three feet apart, the plants being six inches distant in the rows.

HEDGEHOG'S WHITE PLUME.

growers because its stalks and leaves are naturally white, and do not require blanching by the old processes of high banking. By simply tying up the stalks and drawing up the soil with a hoe the work of blanching is complete.

How to Apply Insect Poison.

The bureau of entomology, department of agriculture at Washington, D. C., sends out the following for use as insecticides on or about plants, trees, etc.:

London Purple.—To twenty pounds of flour from one-quarter to one-half pound is added and well mixed. This is applied with a sifter or blower. With forty pounds of water one-quarter to one-half pound is mixed for spraying.

Paris Green.—With twenty pounds of flour from three-quarters to one pound is mixed and applied by sifting or by a blower. The same amount of the insecticide to forty gallons of water is used as a spray.

Bisulphite of Carbon.—For use in the ground a quantity is poured or injected among the roots that are being infested. Against insects damaging stored grain of a museum material a small quantity is used in an air tight vessel.

Carbolic Acid.—A solution of one part in 100 of water is used against parasites and domestic animals and their barns and sheds; also on surface of plants and among the roots in the ground.

Hellebore.—The powder is sifted on alone or mixed one part to twenty of flour. With one gallon of water one ounce powder is used for spraying.

Kerosene Milk Emulsion.—To one part milk add two parts kerosene, and churn by force pump or other agitator. The latter like emulsion is diluted at thirteen with water. An easier method is to simply mix one part of kerosene with eight of pure milk.

Soap Emulsion.—In one gallon hot water one-half pound whale oil soap is dissolved. This, instead of milk, is mixed to an emulsion with kerosene in the same manner and proportion as above.

Pyrethrum.—Pyrethrum insect powder,—in blown or sifted on dry; also applied in water, one gallon to a tablespoonful of the powder, well stirred and then sprayed.

Tobacco Decoction.—This is made as strong as possible as a wash or spray to kill insect pests on animals and plants.

Thinning Fruits.

All horticulturists who grow choice fruit for market realize the importance of thinning out the embryo fruit by relieving trees and vines of any surplus and of all inferior or diseased specimens. Farmers, as a rule, also recognize the importance of thinning fruits, but comparatively few of them do it, the reason being that it is too much trouble. The consequence of neglect in this direction is a lot of inferior fruit, often unfit for any market; very unlike the choice grades that command highest prices.

The surplus of trees or vines may be removed before the flowers have bloomed by the operation of disbudding, or it may be done as soon as the fruit has set; indeed, thinning may still be accomplished after the fruit is half grown, by reducing the number, so that what remains will be fully and perfectly developed. This thinning out of fruit pays alike on pear, peach, plum and other fruit trees, and especially have its good effects been noted on grape vines. It is by the removal of a large portion of embryo fruits that prize grapes, peaches and the like are obtained.

Timely Notes on Bee Keeping.

Work to be done in the apiary during the summer months runs somewhat as follows:

Arrange hives for boxing and extracting.

Have everything in readiness for swarming, if system is practical.

Rear queens, and make artificial swarms.

Ventilate strong swarms in the warm weather.

Remove surplus boxes as soon as full, and supply the place of the first ones with empty boxes.

Look out for the moth larvae in surplus honey and extra combs.

Extract at suitable intervals.

If preparations are to be made for wintering bees indoors the work ought to be done in warm weather, that damp material may be dried before the room is occupied by the bees. Do not neglect refuse comb designed for wax.

Save the Liquid Manure.

Scientists have proven the chemical analysis the value of liquid manure as plant food, and it will pay farmers to save all that is made in stables, barns and cattle sheds. This can be done by conducting it into cisterns or cisterns made for the purpose, or by the use of absorbents. The latter is the more usual plan, and not a few farmers consider the bedding from the stables of horses, sheep and other animals as saturated with urine, one of the most valuable components of the manure pits and compost heap. Liquid manure must be largely diluted before application, hence the plan alluded to of doing it by absorbents and mixing therein with the manure heap, is an excellent one.

The Cabbage Worm.

The cabbage worm is the larva of the white butterfly, and should be hand picked before the first brood has passed the perfect state. Pyrethrum, mixed with five times its weight of plaster, dusted into the center of the leaves with bellows, is effectual. Paris green is also effectual, not being a poison. It is unsafe to use it after the leaves are more than four inches long.

Different Foods as Milk Producers.

The Iowa Agricultural college has made the following classification of the relative values of different foods as milk producers: Starting with 100 pounds of potatoes as giving 10 parts of milk, corn is reckoned 90, timothy 50, barley 55, oats 60, wheat 65, wheat bran 70, clover hay 80, oil meal 145.

The Secret of Raising Sheep.

One great secret in rearing profitable sheep is that there shall be no pause in the growth of the lambs from the time they are dropped. Many failures arise because the lambs' growth is interrupted. Keep the lambs growing is the first and great principle in the economic management of sheep.

Agricultural Notes.

The prospect for the apple crop is discouraging in almost every section except in New England and New York. The present is the "off" or non-bearing year, though many young orchards are fruitful in the "off" year.

A decrease in cotton average is noted in North Carolina, and is attributed to the beginning of an effort on the part of planters so grow their home supplies.

Reports from different states make it appear that there will be a fair grape yield.

From Germany comes the report that a decided preference is given in that country to American hickory for forest culture.

Truck farming in Louisiana is become one of the important industries of that state.

Virginia is raising a less quantity of tobacco, but it is of improved quality.

Favorable reports of the cotton crop come from several states.

Crop reports from Manitoba are encouraging.

Truck farming in readiness for market.

Cut the seed potatoes for planting.

Keep the cows in the stable.

Arrange hives for boxing and extracting.

Have everything in readiness for swarming, if system is practical.

Rear queens, and make artificial swarms.

Ventilate strong swarms in the warm weather.

Remove surplus boxes as soon as full, and supply the place of the first ones with empty boxes.

Extract at suitable intervals.

If preparations are to be made for wintering bees indoors the work ought to be done in warm weather, that damp material may be dried before the room is occupied by the bees. Do not neglect refuse comb designed for wax.

COMPOUND OXYGEN. DRS. STARKEY AND PALEN. A WELL-TRIED TREATMENT. A 200 PAGE BOOK FREE TO YOU. FOR CONSUMPTION, ASTHMA, DYSPEPSIA, CATARRH, HAY FEVER, HEADACHE, DEBILITY, RHEUMATISM, NEURALGIA, and all Chronic and Nervous Disorders.

"COMPOUND OXYGEN" being taken into the system, Nature, Vital Force, Nerve Power, Blood Supply, Nutrition, and the Nervous Centers are invigorated and made more active. Thus the Fountain Head of all activity, both mental and physical, is restored to a state of integrity, and the symptoms of disease, in most cases, disappear and are no more seen. This is the result of a long and tedious study of the system, and the application of the remedy is the result of years of experience. Compound Oxygen is a mild, but powerful tonic in its action, and is a most valuable adjunct to the Medical Profession in the treatment of Chronic Diseases. Its effects are permanent, and its action is in accordance with the laws of nature. Our Treatise on Compound Oxygen, containing a record of cures, testimonials, and a record of surprising but well-attested cures, sent free. Address Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, 1527-1529 Arch St., Phila., Pa.

GOOD NIGHT SONG.

The birds fly home from east and west,
The sheep winds are blowing,
All tired woo things have gone to rest,
And baby must be going.

There's one in white,
And fold him tight,
And whisper once, and twice, "Good night!"
Then set adrift,
The cradle boat
Who shall say what he may sight;
Sailing out and out,
Bowing to and fro,
The winds are soft, the waves are low,
The dream world shows its dim and blue,
The sky is fair, the ship is true.

Oh baby! to my soft behind
Would bring us care and sorrow,
'Tis in the dream world you must find
The laughter for to-morrow.

There kisses grow,
And dimples blow,
And thinking stresses of music flow,
So sweet and clear—
Oh, baby dear,
The time is up to rock and row,
We reach the ship;
So—back we slip—
Again the oars we poise and dip,
We dip and poise—Oh! ship so white,
Now take him in. Sweetheart, good night.

CHINESE PECULIARITIES.

A Chinaman Tells Some of the Curious Customs of His Countrymen.

The highest ambition of a Chinese gentleman is to have a nice coffin and a fine funeral.

Old women instead of the young are the leaders of society.

Love making is only done three days before marriage. It is not only considered the safest way to get ahead of a rival, but the surest way to get a wife without any much trouble.

A previous acquaintanceship between the male and female prevents them from marriage. For this reason a man often weds a girl of his own town.

A man could borrow money on the strength of his having a son, but no one would advance him a cent if he had a dozen of daughters. The former is responsible for the debts of his father for three generations. The latter is only responsible for the debts of her own husband.

When a Chinaman meets another, he shakes and squeezes his own hands; does not shake those of his friend; had not seen each other for a long time, after the manner handshaking they would rub shoulders until they become tired. Instead of asking each other's health, they would say: "How are you eaten your rice? Where are you going? What is your business when you are there? How old are you, and how much did you pay for your shoes?"

Men wear long petticoats and carry fans, while the women wear short jackets and carry canes.

Boats are drawn by horses; carriages moved by sails.

Old men play ball and fly kites, while children fold their arms and look on.

If a Chinaman loses the death of an enemy he goes and hangs himself upon his neighbor's door. It is a sure cure to kill not only that particular enemy, but members of his entire family will be in jeopardy of losing their lives.

When a Chinaman desires a visitor to dine with him he does not ask him to do so, but when he does not wish him to do so he puts the question: "Oh, please stay and dine with me!" The visitor will then know he is not wanted.

Rich men's servant gets no salary, yet many are the applicants, while big salaries are paid to help servants of the common people, but few make applications. The perquisites of the former, often more than triple the salaries of the latter, are the sole reasons of these differences.

When a Chinaman expects a present and it does not come he sends one of lesser value.

To encourage honesty and sincerity common clerks and salesmen in all branches of industries receive an annual salary sufficient to keep them in business besides their regular salary.—Wong Chin Foo in Good Housekeeping.

Simple Method of Artificial Respiration.

The body of the patient is laid on the back, with clothes loosened, and the mouth and nose wiped. Two bystanders stand at right hands and place the body at the level of the waist, and grasp each other's hands, then raise the body until the tips of the fingers and the toes of the subject alone touch the ground; count twenty and then lower the body flat to the ground, and press the elbows to the sides hard; count fifteen again; then raise the body again for the same length of time; and so on, alternately raising and lowering. The head, arms and legs are to be allowed to dangle down quite freely when the body is raised. The author alleges that this method is most successful, and it is so simple that any one can perform it without any instruction.—J. A. Francis in London Medical Record.

The Wet Nurses of Paris.

As a rule these nurses are lusty, healthy, ignorant women, whose sole ambition is to gain a comfortable livelihood with as little effort as possible. Once started upon this career, they follow it for life, preferring it to the menial drudgery of service at a rural chateau or the more slavish environment of a small and sterile farm. When they obtain a foothold they send their infants to nurse their bucolic homes for their mothers or sisters to take care of. Installed as a member of a Parisian household, the wet nurse considers herself in paradise. Her every personal comfort is looked to, and the ostentation of her employers deciding upon her is proportionately great. She revels in the finest delicacies the domestic larder affords, in short, nothing in the line of nibbles is too good for her. In due time she goes off with the baby for drives in the Bois, and seen learns to hold her head as high as any of her ilk. I doubt not she overhears many a verbal morsel of scandal concerning her mistress' friends, but she is discreet and does not tattle, especially if she is "out" for the first time.

No matter what domestic troubles are brewing in the house, nurses must not be involved in them, lest, as a result, the baby should suffer. So easy are the duties and so comparatively lucrative the position of a wet nurse that in many parts of France poor misguided women with nothing but an heavy physique make it a business. So long as they are young they do well in the mercenary sense, but when they get passe and beyond their usefulness as cows, to use the vulgar French name for them, their only alternative is to enter the lists as bonnes, or dry nurses. If they are taken out of France, to the United States for instance, the expenses of their return must be paid, that is if they wish to return, which is seldom the case.—Leon Mead in Chicago Inter Ocean.

Compensating Features.

Yes, it is rather warm, but we must take the weather as it comes. We should be thankful to have any, and even hot weather is better than none at all. It has its compensating features. There is no bothering with overcoats, fur gloves, ear muffs, etc. Fires do not have to be raked every few minutes. Your horse does not have to be rough shod to keep him from falling on the ice. Your own head is not exposed to an avalanche of snow from the roof as you walk the streets. The gas and water pipes are not frozen up. The young man who hangs on your front gate at night is in no danger of being frostbitten. There is no danger of pumps freezing; no necessity of covering cucumber vines, fruit of all kinds is perfectly safe if the boys can't get at it; watermelons are beyond the danger point if they are under lock and key; but winter's ice crop is safe beyond a doubt; no immediate danger of a failure of gard; good time to prune the thermometer by cutting off the lower half. In fact, hot weather has many compensations, not the least of which is that it bonefies patients. Wait and it will be cooler. Christmas is coming.—Indianapolis Journal.

New Use for Coal Waste.

A patent has recently been asked for a new process by which it is proposed to use the waste coal piles at the mouth of every coal mine, and convert the refuse into a sort of gas that can be used the same as natural gas is used. The coal is to be broken up into pieces and run into a hopper. Out of the hopper it comes in portions, and is fed to the retorts. The idea is broken into different chambers, and in circulating around each chamber the particles of the culm rub against each other until by the time the last chamber is reached they are reduced to a fine dust that floats around in the air current. When the last chamber is reached the culm passes through a 110 mesh and comes out in a dark cloud. It is then fed through pipes, like gas. The particles of coal float in the air, and combine with the oxygen of the air to make a hot fire. The inventor claims that this fuel will make no smoke, but will be all consumed before reaching the smokestack, owing to its fineness. The trouble with the invention is that it can be used only on a large scale.—New York Sun.

The Fatal Farrier's Colic.

Farrier's colic is becoming a fatal disease, if what a local farrier tells me amounts to anything. It is contracted by working on raw furs and inhaling the small particles which rise from them. These particles accumulate in the lungs and stomach, and when once they are inhaled it is impossible to rid one's self of them. They are liable to cause consumption or cancer of the stomach. Said my friend, the farrier: "It is impossible for one to work on furs over six months at a time and not become affected. It is very lucky for farriers that that season is not a long one. To be sure when they work six months they receive but six months' pay, but they have a chance to live longer than they would were they obliged to work all the year around. Brass buffing is similar to working on furs. The small particles of brass get into a man's lungs and cause an incurable disease."—"Rambler" in Brooklyn Eagle.

One Style of Manly Beauty.

There is a peculiar classical style of manly beauty which all persons who know anything of the subject must associate with eminence in the law and in oratory. There have been plenty of able lawyers and inspired orators who were anything but handsome men, that that type of strong and comely physiognomy which characterized Daniel Webster, and which has given a title to a certain sort of physical and facial impressiveness, has become a pretty certain index of the quality of man it endows. You say of it: "There is a man who has brains to think and the gift to express his ideas," and you are rarely mistaken in your judgment. A few fools of fortune may wear the masquerade, but they are the accidents, like white metal sections, nickel plates and celves.—Alfred Trumble in New York News.

The Japanese "Jinrikisha."

The "Jinrikisha" of Japan, which began as a cane seated chair with shafts, has now by the gradual process of evolution become a neat, comfortable and thoroughly national vehicle. There are about 180,000 of them used in Japan, of which 80,000 are found in Tokio alone.—New York Tribune.

A Drinking Fountain.

The drinking fountain presented by Mr. George W. Childs, of Philadelphia, to Stratford-on-Avon, is of polished granite and Yorkshire freestone, about fifty feet in height. It combines fountains for man, cattle and dogs, and a four dial clock to be illuminated at night, with musical chimes.

Electricity from One Metal.

It is not necessary to have different metals to obtain a current of electricity. Iron in nitric acid and iron in sulphuric acid, the two fluids being separated by a porous partition, will give a current, one plate wasting away while the other is thickened.—Frank Leslie's.

MYSTERIES OF MICROSCOPY.

The Work of an Enthusiastic Investigator—View of a Fly's Tongue.

Mr. George M. Hopkins, of The Scientific American, is a very enthusiastic microscopist. He has been very faithful and persevering in his investigations, and has written many articles calculated to popularize the science, and thus open the door which leads to a great amount of pleasure in the broad field of nature. Mr. Hopkins' instrument and attachments are valued at $350. An illustrated article in The Scientific American supplement thoroughly demonstrates the fact that much excellent work can be done with what is known as a toy microscope. It says:

"Some have erroneously supposed an expensive instrument and elaborate accessories necessary to the pursuit of microscopical investigations. These things are, of course, desirable; but when one has learned all that can be learned by the aid of the simple and inexpensive microscope, he is very far advanced, and may with propriety present his instrument to some one unable to purchase for himself, and proceed to the selection of something better suited to his advanced position in microscopy."

Recently had the pleasure of spending an hour with Mr. Hopkins at his residence, looking at a few of his objects through his splendid instruments. The pleasure of doing this was greatly heightened by the fact of being in the presence of a person who was thoroughly conversant with the subject and with a skilled hand could arrange the object and equalize the light in such a way that the sections of objects, beetles and insects, shown to their best, while at the same time imparting invaluable information concerning each subject viewed. Sitting down at a revolving table in the center of the room, Mr. Hopkins said:

"Suppose we look at the fly's tongue?"

"All right," said I. "They have been investigating me for a long time, and nothing would give me more pleasure than to see a fly's tongue transfixed and to investigate it calmly under the microscope."

Accordingly Mr. Hopkins placed the subject in position, and turning the table, I brought my eye to bear upon the object. The fly's tongue is certainly a complicated piece of mechanism. A description would do it justice; it must be seen to be appreciated. The entire subject was a section of a horsefly, showing the complete kit of tools with which he purches his victim. It combines fountains

AN OPTIMISTIC VIEW.

Archbishop Walsh, of Ireland, Talks About the Probable Effects of Coercion.

The report of an interview with Archbishop Walsh at Dublin on the probable effect of the coercion act is sent across the ocean by cable.

The Archbishop said he does not regard it as a political question, but as one purely social, moral and religious. It touched the peace, welfare and happiness of every household in the land. It is quite certain that the liberal extension of the act would break up every branch, the National League, and absolutely with some trifle, its moral prestige. The act, as it now stands, is probably quite as moderate as any coercion act could be, and it is as far any other coercion act that the Irish Nationalists look upon it as a measure that England would only fully and herself of as an extreme resort. The Archbishop said he was not a prophet, but from this act, and looking upon the amended act bill as removing a large portion of the injustices of which the farmers complained, augurs high prospects for the future. He, too, thinks that in a year or two more an Irish Parliament will again sit in the old Parliament House in Dublin. The Archbishop said he was not a Home Ruler. Archbishop added to the shipped, the fact seems appalling that for the three months ending July 2, 5,146 persons have been evicted. Ominous he said, did not want an appeal to the country this year when they were so confident it was could be that Gladstone would go back to power with a tremendous majority to back him.

THE NATIONAL GAME.

A Hot Fight for the Base-Ball Championship.

DETROIT and Chicago are having a hot struggle for the championship of the National League. In the American Association Von der Ahe's St. Louis nine continues to lead the field. The following tables show the standing of the clubs in the two associations:

About Wheat.

WHEAT is selling in Vienna at a lower price than for twenty-three years. The Ohio wheat crop is estimated at 35,000,000 bushels, a falling off of 8,000,000 bushels from last year. The French wheat crop will exceed that of last year by about 5,000,000 hectolitres. The harvest reports from Russia are favorable, but Danish crops were damaged last year by a terrific hailstorm. Grain was beaten into the ground, and there was not enough left for seeding purposes. The amount of wheat in sight in this country was increased last week 958,347 bushels, and of corn 284,100 bushels. The stock of corn decreased 284,320 bushels. The official showing makes the visible supply of wheat at the present time 33,693,259 bushels, of corn 7,398,808 bushels, and of oats 2,968,792 bushels.

Heavy Failures in Chicago.

A CHICAGO telegram announces the failure of the W. O. Tyler Paper Company with liabilities amounting to about $300,000. It is thought the assets will not be much more than one-half the amount. An assignee was named and the Sheriff took possession. Baird & Dillon, wholesale silverware house, Chicago, also made an assignment. So far as is known the liabilities will reach probably $175,000, while it is believed the assets will realize more than $40,000.

Dakota Horse-Thieves.

PIERRE (Dak.) dispatch: "Cattle Inspector Jackson has unearthed ten horse-thieves, who have plied their business between here and the Black Hills for ten years. The gang is led by a half-breed named Van Moore, a character well known in Deadwood. Jackson captured him in Rosebud reservation and he is now in jail. Van Moore made a full confession, implicating some fifteen different persons, and told the whereabouts of stolen horses. Moore is now on trial before United States Commissioner Coe."

The Fishery Dispute.

The fishery complications with Canada seem to be increasing. Excitement continues in Halifax over the seizure of the American schooner J. H. Perrin at Souris. The Perrin is charged with violations of the treaty of 1818 as well as with instructions of the Dominion customs laws. It is rumored that the British war ships now in North American waters will hereafter assist the Canadian fleet in keeping the Yankee fisherman out of the disputed area.

July Fire Record.

The fire record for July shows the fire loss in the United States and Canada to have been $14,700,000, against $10,000,000 in July, 1886, and $9,000,000 in July, 1885. This is just double the average loss in July for the past twelve years. The total loss for the first seven months of 1887 was $70,928,100, against $67,000,000 for the corresponding period of 1886.

Many Heads Broken.

A PARTY of Nationalist excursionists from Belfast were mobbed by Orangemen near that city. Clubs and pistols were freely used, and many heads were broken.

THE WESTERN STATES.

THE trial of the Chicago boodlers has resulted in a verdict of guilty. Seven of the defendants go to the State Prison for two years, while four of them get off with a fine of $1,000. The closing scenes of the celebrated trial are thus described in a special from Chicago:

"Guilty of conspiracy as charged in the indictment" was the verdict of the 'boodle' jury returned to Judge Jamieson a few minutes before 9 o'clock last night, after six hours deliberation. The defendants convicted are Michael Cassidy, ex-Commissioner Daniel J. Wren, ex-Commissioner in charge of the penitentiary; Commissioner Michael Wasserman, two years; ex-Commissioner Adam Ochs, two years; ex-Commissioner Jacob Rehm, two years; ex-Commissioner Harry A. Varnell, two years; Commissioner James J. Buck McCarthy, $1,000 fine; Commissioner Christian Geils, $1,000 fine; Commissioner Christian Caseman, $1,000 fine. Commissioner Michael J. Sheridan Matson was notified that the jury had agreed. Eleven men who had been doing business for the country jogged slowly into the court room near the result. Wren, with his trimmed straw hat on his head was in his place. Cassidy, Rehm, Varnell, Ochs, McCarthy, and the rest soon followed. McCarthy had sent the railing mock as a martyr. Then the jury tramped slowly in. Caseman breathed like a stricken man. He scarcely sustained himself in his chair by grasping the table with both hands. Wren, Cassidy, Wasserman, Ochs, Rehm and Varnell had lost the robust color of their faces. Van Pelt's enlivened pallor was a shade lighter than usual. Wren appeared stolid but nervous. All the defendants were aware of the expected the extreme penalty—two years at hard labor in the Joliet Penitentiary—seemed an hour to them. Then the Judge asked if they had agreed upon a verdict. Foreman Brown arose and said, 'We have, your Honor.' The tinkle of the court gang on the railing was lost in the rustle of the battle of the witness box who had once been respectable citizens waited the verdict of their peers. Ten of them had been elected to the County Board by the people whose confidence they were on trial for having betrayed. The Civil service law was broken down by Mr. Brown. 'We, the jury, find the defendants guilty of conspiracy, as charged in the indictment.' No surprise everybody expected it. The defendants expected it. Wren, Cassidy, Ochs, Rehm, and the clerk read their bonds. The company of bondsmen who came with Judge Tuley to defend Cook County's false prosecutors. 'And its the penitentiary,' continued the clerk, as deliberately as if reading the verdict of their peers. Then he read the names of seven men who had been convicted of the same offense. Varnell, Matson, and Buck McCarthy sat dazed. Wren dropped his arms outside his chair. Cassidy's face grew ashen and his lips quivered. Van Pelt never moved a muscle. Ochs leaned his head on his hand. Rehm's face grew bronzed and wrinkled beneath his tan. Wasserman's head drooped on the floor. Caseman's head shoved his face forward anxiously, but slid out of sight in his chair. Wren, Cassidy, Rehm, Ochs, McCarthy, Varnell, Caseman, Geils, $1,000 fine. Caseman's face was a study in contrasting emotions. Relief followed. He recovered himself and his color came back. Ochs did not change. His face was as pale when he left as when he came. Caseman suffered more than the others. Varnell, Matson, and Buck McCarthy maintained their composure. They seemed appreciative of the fact that the jury had given them a fine instead of the penitentiary. The jury, with pants and presence of mind unbuttoned, filed out of the witness box in his face. A smile wandered over his big red countenance. The rest of the men who had left not present. McCarthy was on his feet in a moment. He shook hands with the jury as pallid, and Judge Jamieson spoke a few words to some one in the audience opened his mouth to speak. Ex-Sheriff Kern, Deputy Sheriffs Hunt started for him and his enthusiasm was suddenly checked. Commissioner Wren's counsel early entered a motion for a new trial.

A Fire Attorney for Maxwell, the St. Louis trunk murderer, has obtained a writ of error to claim a case from Justice Miller, of the United States Supreme Court, and therefore the execution, which was set for the 25th of this month, will be deferred.

An Omaha special says the little excursion train to Manawa, bearing a party of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, capsized in Lake Manawa, three miles south of Council Bluffs, precipitating about thirty excursionists, all men, into the water. Joseph Lemon and George Cartwright, of Omaha, and C. H. Pharson, of Council Bluffs, were drowned; also two others whose names are not known. Their bodies were recovered. It is thought two or three more were drowned. The rest were rescued.

THOUSANDS of acres of land have been burned over in the neighborhood of Joliet, Ill., for a distance of ten miles. The prairie flames were in some instances twenty feet high, and at times rolled along the prairie faster than a man could run. One house, hay, machinery, fence, etc., were destroyed. The people were organized as fire-fighters; women are offering prayers for rain.

A TELEGRAM from Ellensburg, W. T., says: Fifty tons of rock fell in the eastern cut of the Cascades tunnel, now being built by the Northern Pacific Railroad, filling four miles and wounding several others.

NATURAL gas has for some years been known to exist in many localities around Albert Lea, Minnesota. Several small wells have been sunk, which were regarded as curiosities and never turned to any account. Now a company has been formed to operate gas wells on ten thousand acres of land, and to propose to light and heat Albert Lea and neighboring cities.

THE work on the launching of the new steamer Wolf, at Wolf & Davidson's shipyard, Milwaukee, a wave, caused by the displacement of the water, broke over a dock and shed covered with people and swept them into the lake. Three persons were killed and many injured fatally. A Milwaukee dispatch says it is unfortunate affair

The cause of the accident is not fully determined, but some eight people were on a timber or runway over the dock of the Northwestern Lumber Company when the huge vessel made her plunge as the last block was knocked away. A wave of water, estimated at a foot in height, went from end through the walk of people. The plank was seen to lift and then crash down upon the heads of those below, pinning many of the people beneath the fallen timbers, maiming, bruising, and drowning. The scene of the tale tragedy. The immense wave swept up on the dock, between the piles of lumber, and dashed with force against the coal sheds, and throwing many people into the water. Fortunately all were rescued without serious injury.

THE EASTERN STATES.

THE trunk of Mooney, the man who tried to destroy the British steamer Queen at New York, was filled with explosives and infernal machines—enough, it is said, to blow up a fleet.

TREASURER Rosie, of the Soldiers and Sailors' Home at Bath, N. Y., is a defaulter for nearly $9,000. His friends promise to make good the deficit. Daniel Desmond, a salesman for Le Bouillier Brothers, dry goods merchants of New York, has been arrested for embezzling $12,000 from his employers.

THE SOUTHERN STATES.

NEAR Greenwood, Va., the first-class coach and two sleepers of an express train were thrown from the track. The baggagemaster was beheaded, and a dozen passengers were badly wounded.

A TELEGRAM from Macon (Ga.) says:

"Nine women in one hoodoo! Nine more deaths have occurred between midnight on Friday and daybreak this morning, at the house of Mr. R. T. Woolfolk, on the Baldwin road, about two miles and a half out from Macon. The victims are R. T. Woolfolk, his wife, Mrs. Sallie Woolfolk, Mrs. Mollie Woolfolk, Mrs. Susan Cole, Mrs. Annie Bonsteel, Charles Hoole, Mrs. Jane Woolfolk, and Mrs. T. West, a sister of Mrs. Woolfolk. According to the Coroner's jury, the deed was done by Mrs. Mary J. Woolfolk, the eldest son of Mr. R. T. Woolfolk by his first wife, and who is about 21 years of age. It appears that Mrs. Mary J. Woolfolk was sent to the jail in Macon to prevent her being lynched, which doubtless would have been his fate had he been present when the verdict was announced. The testimony developed the fact that at the first four stops Thomas Woolfolk in one buggy with Charles Hoole, Mrs. Jane Woolfolk, aged 21, and Charlie, aged 19, in a room back of it slept Captain Woolfolk and wife and Mattie, aged 3 months. In a room opposite this slept Mrs. West, aged 21; Bonsteel, aged 17; Pearl, aged 17, and Annie, aged 10. When the bodies were discovered all were in their beds except Mrs. Jane Woolfolk, who was sitting in a rocking chair with an ax, and there were evidences of a struggle. The motive of the murderer was to gain possession of his father's property. Every one of the victims was fearfully beaten about the head. One of the girls Pearl was murdered in the hallway, and was probably the last to fall. Woolfolk gave the alarm himself, and his blood-thirsty daughter fired the crime upon him, although he declared his innocence."

A later dispatch from Macon says:

The most remarkable funeral on record occurred here when the nine victims of the Woolfolk tragedy were buried yesterday afternoon. Twenty hack plans in the procession, and about 200 people, many of whom followed the procession of five persons from the scene of the tragedy, thirteen miles from Macon. The procession started from Woolfolk's at 10 o'clock, and reaching Macon at 5 o'clock. The hearses were followed by a hack which contained a person by the name of Woolfolk, the entire family in that section having been wiped out of existence the week before. The Rev. S. R. Branham took a position among the graves and addressed the people. He had been brought in on a special train from the arrival of Mrs. Edwards, own sister of the murdered, who was in Athens at the time of the crime and arrived in Macon while the cortege was filing into the cemetery. He was almost frantic with grief and her cries brought tears to the eyes of all. She said she was glad her mother said he could say no more and wondered.

A FORT WORTH (Texas) dispatch reports that—

A number of men and boys were collected on the outskirts of town that city on Saturday night, engaged in firing salutes and discharging fireworks in honor of the victory won in the State by the anti-prohibitionists. A keg of powder had been secured for the occasion and some of the boys were standing around it when some from the other side of town thought they would have a little fun by the keg of powder. Carlos Lawrence, a boy about fifteen years old, was blown several feet into the air, and his body was found in a badly torn and expired Sunday morning. Wave Hatchell, a boy about 14 years of age, was blown to pieces and his remains were picked up in small pieces, was stripped of his clothing from the waist down, and terribly scalded. Other boys, Sam Johnson and William Saakberry, were terribly hurt and necessarily fatally burned.

THE NATIONAL CAPITAL.

An Associated Press telegram reports President Cleveland as saying that he—

Felt it to be an absolute necessity that he should devote himself to the business of the Executive Office, and that he would be compelled to decline to see delegations or to make appointments for a short time. He said he was in receipt of letters and telegrams from all parts of the country, which, in most instances, he felt bound to be opened to be in the hands of the Secretary, and which, in most instances, he felt bound to be answered

THE JOURNAL

CHAS. J. GRIER, EDITOR.

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

The fourth annual reunion of the Soldiers' and Sailors' association of Northwest Michigan will be held at Reed City on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, Sept. 6, 7, and 8.

The fact that first-class hotel accommodations greatly benefit a town is proven by the necessity for another great hotel at Mackinac Island. Plank's grand hotel just opened last June, accommodates more people than all the other hotels on the Island, yet guests are every day turned away for want of room and another grand hotel is being planned. A corporation with capital stock of $300,000 has been created and a larger structure than Plank's will be built.

Mrs. Rose Terry Cooke says that American women don't know how to live. If they want health, she writes, let them learn to live in fresh air—open their windows, wear flannel night-gowns, and take a jug of hot water to bed if they are cold, but never to sleep with closed windows and air all their clothes and their room daily, eat simple, wholesome food, wear boneless waists and button their skirts on them, and take the heels off their boots. Then, she argues, they will be rosy, happy, healthy, and a comfort to everybody as well as themselves.

PROOF CALLED FOR.

"We will pay the Journal five dollars cash to prove any one single case where a hotel man or real estate agent has been guilty of the charges made by the Journal."—Petoskey Democrat.

All right, sir, produce the cash.

It was a banker real estate agent who labored with a Canadian farmer several days to sell him a place, without success, and when the Canadian expressed a determination to look at a place near Charlevoix before deciding, the agent followed him to the boat and told him there was nothing in Charlevoix,—not even a hotel fit to get a meal of victuals; that he would be sorry he wasted his time and money coming over,—and a lot of other falsehoods. Two hours later he called the man to the telephone, and told him all the land around Charlevoix was covered by Indian titles, and that the agent of the farm he was to look at could not give a clear title under any circumstances. If you want the full particulars of this deal, inquire of A. D. Cruickshank, of Charlevoix, who sold the Canadian a good farm and gave a clear title.

Albert Field, of Eaton Rapids, describes the hotel man who said there was no boat to Charlevoix till afternoon, when at that moment the Friant was nearing the Petoskey dock on her regular run to Charlevoix, as a medium sized man, about fifty years old, slightly gray hair and whiskers, and represented the hotel "nearest the depot." And he succeeded in getting quite a number to go to his house for breakfast and dinner, and wait for the afternoon boat, when they really desired to get to Charlevoix at first opportunity.

Mr. Cortwright, of Eaton county, was told in the office of the Exchange hotel, that neither the steamers Lawrence or City of Grand Rapids could enter the Charlevoix harbor, and that those boats did not stop at Charlevoix.

These are the falsehoods and misrepresentations the JOURNAL complained of. We have had reason for similar complaints many times before, but never took pains to write them down. The Democrat has demanded the proof and we have produced it, and we shall produce some more in the future, unless the policy of falsehood, bulldozing, and bluff is stopped.

Save your cash, Mr. Democrat; bluff won't work here.

Next Season's Increase.

It is now evident that next year will witness a remarkable increase in the passenger facilities lake-wise. We are informed from a reliable source that the Detroit and Cleveland Steam Navigation Company will put two boats on between Chicago and Mackinac Island, to run in connection with the City of Alpena and City of Mackinac, each boat to make two round trips a week and touching at Milwaukee, Ludington, Manistee, Charlevoix and Petoskey only. This will give the Company a fast passenger line from Chicago to Cleveland, and the Lake Michigan end of the line will, like the Lake Huron and Lake Erie boats, make freight business a secondary consideration.

The new passenger boat now under contract at Manitowoc will make two round trips between Chicago and Little Traverse bay, thus giving us a fast passenger boat from Chicago six days in the week

There is no reason why these boats should not do the same immense business done by the City of Alpena and City of Mackinac, and if so they will add thousands of tourists and resorters to the thousands who come every summer, and give a great impetus to all the resorts that cluster around Little Traverse bay.

People now living in Petoskey will sometime see the shores of the bay lined with villas from seven to nine mile point, and forty miles of boulevard, shaded with trees and level as a floor, connecting the resorts and summer homes which line the bluffs.

This region is only in its infancy of its development now; and the time will come when a number of railroads and boat lines will be taxed to their full capacity to carry the summer population of northern Michigan to and fro.—Petoskey Record.

The Friant Sold for Delivery Oct. 1st.

It is understood that Capt. Vanderhoef last week accepted the proposition of Sandusky parties, and will deliver the Thos. Friant to them here on October 1st.

The Friant has become most popular boat that ever touched at this port because of her speed, staunchness, and the accommodating spirit of her owner and commander, Capt. Vanderhoef, and were the Friant to be taken off the Petoskey and Charlevoix run without the assurance that her place would be filled by as good or better boat, there would be universal regret. We are glad to state how ever, that Capt. Vanderhoef will this winter build a larger and yet faster boat and have her ready by the opening of navigation to take the Friant's place on the route. He has not yet decided on her dimensions, but she will probably have double the carrying capacity, and more than double the power of the Friant.

The enterprising captain will never rest satisfied until he has a boat which can run from the mouth of Pine River to the Petoskey dock—18 miles—in an hour, without hurrying her at all.—Petoskey Record.

Natural and Manufactured Ice.

It occurred to me a short time ago that manufactured ice was not as good as the natural ice, and I proceeded to investigate the subject. I found that on holding a piece of natural ice in one hand and a piece of manufactured in the other, that the difference in temperature could be readily demonstrated. I could hold the manufactured ice in my hand until it melted, but the natural article grew so cold that I had to drop it. It would seem at first thought that ice ought to be ice, but after a great amount of mental labor I was enabled to solve to my own satisfaction the problem of one kind of ice being colder than another. Water freezes at 32 degs. Fahrenheit, but after it forms into ice the temperature can be reduced until the lowest possible point is reached. As the ice becomes colder I suppose it gets harder and becomes more compact. I have never been able to test it accurately, but I believe that a cubic foot of natural ice will weigh more than a cubic foot of the manufactured.—Ice Dealer in Globe-Democrat.

The Cost of Solomon's Temple.

The talents of gold, silver and brass used in the construction of the temple amounted to $34,399,112,500. The jewels are reckoned to have exceeded that amount, but let them be estimated as equal to it. The vessels of silver consecrated to the uses of the temple were equal to $2,446,720,000, the vessels of gold, $2,726,481,015; the silk vestments of the priests, $99,000; the purple vestment of the singers, $1,000,000; trumpets, $100,000; other musical instruments, $200,000. Ten thousand men were engaged in hewing timber on Lebanon, 70,000 were bearers of burdens, 20,960 men were overseers, all of whom were employed seven years. Solomon bestowed on them $33,660,885. Food and wages, estimated at $1.12 1-2 per day, $469,385,440; the cost of the stone and timber in the rough, $13,726,480,000.

Climate of Tangier.

Like all countries of this latitude, devoid of proper forest growth the seasons are practically but two—wet and dry. From October to April the rains are frequent, the thermometer ranging from 50 to 60 degs. From April to October there is but little rain, and the thermometer varies from 65 to 80 degs. The climate is not dry, but the dampness is all a salt dampness from the Mediterranean, as a rule, and at times the east wind or Levanta is so strong that everything exposed to it becomes wet.—Tangier Cor. Philadelphia Call.

An Interesting Relic.

The office of register of wills for this district is being overhauled and repaired. Among the old papers discovered was an instrument executed by Gen. Kosciusko, dated May 5, 1798, in which he authorized his friend, Thomas Jefferson, to dispose of his property and to devote the proceeds to the freeing of negro slaves.—Washington Cor. Chicago News.

A man without reproach, from whom the breath of scandal passes like common breath from any other polished surface, could afford to do what other common men could not.—Charles Dickens.

There are few women who are good judges of their own faces.—Dr. Wm. A. Hammond.

AROUND THE COUNTY.

East Jordan.

In the last two years we have made but few visits to our neighbors up the Arm, and on a trip this week we noticed numerous changes and improvements.

Main street has been graded and clayed from the rink to the Central house, and is to be graveled this fall; and new eight foot sidewalk has been laid both sides. This week State street is being raised about two feet, and will be clayed and graveled. Several other streets have been graded, and since the incorporation last winter a large amount of new sidewalk has been built.

There seems to be more new buildings in process of erection, and additions being made, than at any previous visit, though in the minds of the people there is less of a "boom" than two years ago.

F. E. Boosinger & Co. succeed John Chamberlain in the dry goods business, and the postoffice has been moved to the same building, one door north of the Commercial hotel.

H. Wilensky occupies the store recently occupied by Boosinger with the postoffice.

Under the management of A. B. Nicholas, the Commercial is holding its excellent reputation as the best hotel in the town, and is the popular house with commercial travelers.

C. W. Dunham & Co. have recently moved their large stock of furniture into the building adjoining the Central house, where they can display their fine assortment to much better advantage.

Glenn & Porter advertise themselves as the "bee hive," and to judge by their evening trade, they are truly a hive of industry. And we under stand this industry is not confined to their store, for both their large sawmills under the management of J. E. Potter are as truly "bee-hives." Just now they are cutting an immense pile of lumber every day. The west side mill is said to be doing better work than ever before.

S. G. Isaman is building a comfortable office in the rear of his store on State street.

By the consolidation of the Boyne Falls Gazette with the Enterprise, Mr. C. F. Dixon has a very complete printing office, his assortment of type and material being such as to make less fortunate printers envious.

J. A. Stevens, formerly of Charlevoix, has just repainted his residence on the terrace, giving it a very attractive appearance.

We learn (unofficially) that D. C. Loveday is about to begin the erection of a brick block to accommodate his large hardware trade.

G. B. Martin is comfortably settled in his new bank building opposite the Commercial, and seems to be enjoying his pleasant quarters.

Mr. Harry Branch has recently purchased the drug and stationery business of Dr. Warne, and will make East Jordan his permanent home if this climate agrees with his health. Mr. Branch is also a professional roller skater, having given exhibitions in nearly all the principal rinks in the United States. Next Tuesday night he will appear at the Charlevoix rink.

On the west side we found Long & Draper just finishing a new store building seventy feet long and two stories high, to be occupied in a few days with a mammoth new stock of general merchandise. Al. is up to his eyes in business, and seems to be pushing things energetically.

P. H. LaClair has completed a new store, has a good stock, and seems to be happy,—which is good evidence of a satisfactory trade.

There are several other new buildings on the west side, erected since our last visit, whose proprietors we did not have time to interview.

South Arm (the home of Sol. Isaman) is making a good substantial growth, and in the near future Sol. will begin to realize some of his fondest dreams.

The East Jordan Driving Park Association are preparing a half-mile race track, to be ready in time for the annual fair of the Charlevoix County Agricultural Society, Sept. 20-22. Speed premiums are offered for three days of the exhibition, which will insure increased interest and attendance at the fair.

The officers of the agricultural society are making extra efforts to interest the farmers in the exhibits this fall, and hope to give a display of agricultural products better than ever before. The premium lists have been issued (much earlier than last year), and their careful circulation will enable our rural friends to select their best specimens and keep them for the exhibit. (Copies of the premium list may be obtained at this office.)

On the whole, East Jordan seems to be prospering this year, and making substantial permanent improvements, both public and private.

Wilson.

School directors are now taking the census.

Mr. Lewis and family attended quarterly meeting in South Arm on Sunday last.

Elder Tracy preached at the school house on Sunday evening.

Albert Todd is convalescent, but not able to work yet.

Forty were in attendance at Sunday school on Sabbath last. The interest seems good and increasing.

Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Jones were guests of Mr. and Mrs. Hudkins for a few days last week.

Mr. and Mrs. Sedgeman and children, of Advance, were guests of Mrs. and Mr. J. L. Smith one day recently.

Mrs. Augusta Cook, nee Knuttle, was visiting her parents recently.

Misses Dolly Shepherd and Ruth Burley were at home for a few days last week.

Several families from Antrim Co. attended the Sunday school celebration.

Bethel S. S. picnic occurred on Friday, the 19th. Literary exercises were the first in order. Then edibles were discussed, which were delicious and plenty. Games for the young, finished the day, which were enjoyed by all.

Miss Jones' school closed Friday last. The children had several songs and recitations, which were finely rendered.

J. R. Vance's mill burned on Wednesday morning. It had been left two hours before, with no visible fire. It comes rather hard on Mr. Vance as this is the second time within a year. The other swept out nearly everything, but as the foundation was not disturbed the outlay will not be as great. He has already begun repairs and hopes to have it running within a month.

Mrs. Overmin and son, Will, of Indiana, have been guests of Mr. and Mrs. Hudkin, for two weeks. They are a sister and nephew of Mrs. Hudkin. This is the first meeting in twenty-two years. They expect to return home next week.

Tyler.

The infant child of Mr. and Mrs. C. Christian, of Ironton, died last Friday, aged seven weeks. The funeral was held in the Congregational church Sunday afternoon, conducted by Rev. W. G. Clark, of Charlevoix.

Chas. Graham and Sylvester Newson left one day last week for Scott's Point, in the upper peninsula.

Miss Laura Jarman, who has been absent at Oberlin, Ohio, since the 10th of last September, returned home on Saturday, the 13th.

Mrs. Bryan, of New London, Ohio, and daughter Mrs. Wilhelmina Myers, of southern Michigan, who have been visiting Mrs. Bryan's daughter, Mrs. Mead Benson, and sister, Mrs. Robert Bedwin, returned to the southern part of the state last Thursday.

It is with deep regret that we announce the death of Miss Mary Fried, who died at Detroit on Monday, Aug. 8, aged 16. It will be remembered that Miss Fried, accompanied by her mother, Mrs. James Fried, left Ironton some three weeks ago to be treated, but failed very fast until on the date above mentioned, when the angel of death came and released her from her suffering. She had resided at Ironton with her parents for the past few years, and had won many friends at that place and vicinity, who will miss her from their society. She was a member of the young ladies' helping hand society at Ironton.

The threshing machines have made their appearance again.

The helping hand society met with Miss Daisy Allen last Wednesday.

James Fried returned from Detroit last week where he has been attending the sickness and death of his daughter.

J. D. Parrish informed us that he is running a rag and rubber wagon on his own account. He also informed us that in just nine days he bought 5,604 pounds of surplus rags and old rubber.

Aug. 22th.

Give Them a Chance!

That is to say, your lungs. Also all your breathing machinery. Very wonderful machinery it is. Not only the larger air-passages, but the thousands of little tubes and cavities leading from them.

When these are clogged and choked with matter which ought not be there, your lungs cannot half do their work. And what they do, they cannot do well.

Call it cold, cough, croup, pneumonia, catarrh, consumption, or any of the family of throat and nose and head and lung obstructions, all are bad. All ought to be got rid of. There is just one sure way to get rid of them. That is to take Boschee's German syrup, which any druggist will sell you at 75 cents a bottle. Even if everything else has failed you, you may depend upon this for certain.

Patrick Burke, of Elgin, Ill., came last Friday, for the remains of Jack Hartly, second cook, of the late Champlain. Mr. Burke says that he is the father of Jack Hartly, and that Jack's real name is Thomas Burke. The young man ran away from home and shipped under the assumed name, that his friends should not know his whereabouts.

One of the most notable social events of the season took place at the residence of S. Rosenthal on Lake street in this city, the occasion being the marriage of his son, Mr. Alexander Rosenthal to Miss Minnie Wunderlick of Chicago. The ceremony was performed at 5-30 p. m., in the presence of the relatives and a few invited guests, by the Rev. Dr. Danok, of Chicago, in a very impressive manner. The presents were numerous and costly, over half being at Charlevoix awaiting the arrival of the happy couple who will hereafter make that place their home. Among the presents at the house were a $300 check from Mr. S. Rosenthal, a beautiful silver water set, silver table sets of many and various elaborate designs, books by favorite authors, handsomely bound, and indeed everything which could be used to ornament and furnish their home. Vocal and instrumental solos by Miss Brill, of Alpena, Mrs. Gardner, and Mr. Arner, of this city, entertained the company through the evening.—Daily Reporter.

Hugh Miller, one of the pioneers of this county, died at his residence in this township Saturday afternoon at the age of 67. He has resided in this county for twenty years, and was highly respected by all who knew him. The funeral was held at the family home Sunday, conducted by Rev. W. H. McCartney. "Hugh Miller was born the third of March, 1820, at Balla Walter, in the county of Down, Ireland. He came with his parents to America in the year 1834, and spent the years of his youth and young manhood, in the town of Osweatebie, St. Lawrence county, New York. In the spring of 1858, he removed to this county, with his family, when it was but a wilderness, but few white settlers having preceeded him. Of his family four daughters and his wife preceeded him across the dark river, whilst one daughter, and two sons yet remain on this shore. Of his father's family, an aged stepmother, three brothers, and one sister survive him." One intimate with Mr. Miller in his life time says: "he never connected himself with any church organization, for this reason; that he was a firm believer in the Fatherhood of God, and the brotherhood of man, and the final happiness of all mankind."

The last quarterly service of this conference year, will be held at the Ironton M. E. church beginning Friday evening and continuing Saturday and Sunday.

The resorts of Northern Michigan will be pleased to learn that Mr. Leigh Lynch, for 9 years manager of the Union Square Theatre in New York, and Mrs. Langtry's manager last season has brought together a number of the best musicians in the country for a recreation tour of the resorts. It is called the Anna Berger Concert Company, that gifted lady, the greatest lady cornetist in the world, being at the head. Miss Eleanor Beebee and her brother J. Fred Beebee are the soprano and tenor and bear the highest encomiums of the press and the public. The contralto is Miss Nellie Goodwin, late of the Bennett Opera Company that made a tour of southern winter resorts, whose voice is wonderful in its range, power and sweetness as well as cultivation. Miss Kate Helmer, the pianist, is an artist in every sense of the term, and in order that every one should be happy Mr. Alvah Heywood, the great musical humorist, was secured. As Artemus Ward once said "He is an amoosin cuss" The Company appear at Charlevoix Friday and Saturday, August 26 and 27.

Base Ball.

Last Thursday and Friday our boys played at Cheboygan with the team of that place. Thursday the boys were feeling well and played a strong game although Cheboygan had imported a new battery of an enviable reputation. The score by innings is as follows:

Innings	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9

Friday some of the boys were disabled and the result was adverse.

Innings	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Charlevoix	1	1	0	0	2	1	1	0	–5
Cheboygan	0	0	4	0	0	0	5	1	–10

Returning from Cheboygan, according to agreement, the boys played at Petoskey with the team of that place, but the boys having played all the week, were tired out and did not do themselves justice. The result is as follows:

Innings	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Charlevoix	0	0	1	0	0	1	1	0	–3
Petoskey	0	1	3	2	1	2	1	*	–10

Tuesday of this week Petoskey came over to again carry off the prize, but our boys had recovered from their last week's fatigue, and Petoskey was again compelled to acknowledge the superiority of Charlevoix's playing. This was the most interesting contest of the season, and resulted as follows:

Innings	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Charlevoix	0	1	3	0	1	0	*	*	–5
Petoskey	0	0	1	0	1	0	1	0	–3

Cheboygan and Charlevoix played this afternoon, the score resulting, Charlevoix 4, Cheboygan 3. Another game will be played tomorrow.

Resolutions of Respect.

The following resolutions were adopted by the Ironton helping hand society at their special meeting Aug. 22d:

Whereas, A divine and mysterious providence has seen fit to remove from our midst by the hand of death our friend Mary E. Fried, whom we all respected and loved, and whose loss we mourn;

Resolved, That this society deeply deplores the unhappy circumstances which have attended her long illness and death; and

Resolved, That we tender the bereaved parents and relatives the sincere and heartfelt sympathy of this society, in the hope that a higher consolation may be richly imparted to such wounded hearts.

Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to furnish a copy of these resolutions to the parents of the deceased, and to the county papers for publication. NELLIE NOYES, Secretary.

Masonic School of Instruction.

Hon. Arthur M. Clark, the Grand Lecturer, is here and will hold the meeting in the Masonic hall, tomorrow afternoon and evening. Mr. Charles LaTour, the editor of "The Weekly Freemason," of Detroit, is also here and will attend this meeting. Mr. LaTour is looking after the interest of his paper, and wishes the brothers to all subscribe for it. Only $1.00 per year.

Labor's Annual Holiday.

Organized labor of northern Michigan having determined to celebrate Labor Day, September 5th, we call on you to lay your aside implements of toil on that day, and to join with us in celebrating this grand national holiday of labor, and make it the greatest feature of the year. The new holiday will be duly celebrated all over the United States and Canada, and the members of labor organizations here are determined not to be behind, therefore we urge all the labor organized in this vicinity to come forward and take part in this exhibition of strength and unity of labor forces in this section of the state. The main feature of the celebration will be a grand English barbecue for which a large roast ox will be offered.

No date on the calender is so important, so dear to the people as Labor day. Other holidays—reminders of sectional hate and bloody wars and human sacrifices—pale in the light of this harbinger of peace and good will.

Let us commemorate the day in a befitting manner, with a display of enthusiasm and gratification appropriate for such an occasion; and let it be for labor's hosts the practical inauguration of an era of recognition, reconciliation and reward.

The co-operation of every division of labor is earnestly requested—Knights of Labor, trades unionists, all protective and benevolent organizations of working men and women.

Shoulder to shoulder we will march before the strongholds of capitalism, a mighty legion, with lofty aspirations, clear and rational purposes, the intelligence and determination incomparable; hand to hand we will enjoy the pleasure of the fraternal festival, and when the day closes it will find us vowing unflagging fellowship on all issues and occasions of common interest.

Senator C. I. Doyo, of Oxford, will deliver his celebrated lecture, "The Commonwealth of Industry." Mrs. Christina Burghorn, of Luther, the talented lady orator, will also address the people; subject: The true aim of the present reformers. Local speakers are also to be present. The day's festivities will close with a grand labor ball at opera hall or the skating rink. Each delegation is invited to bring bands and American flags.

By order of the committee.

Personal.

Mr. H. N. Fridlebstein, of Mobile, Ala., writes: I take great pleasure in recommending Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, having used it for a severe attack of Bronchitis and Catarrh. It gave me instant relief and entirely cured me, and I have not been afflicted since. I also beg to state that I have tried other remedies with no good result. Have also used Electric Bitters and Dr. King's New Life Pills, both of which I can recommend.

Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Coughs, and Colds, is sold on a positive guarantee. Trial bottles free at Dr. G. W. Crouter's drug store. 1

Wonderful Cures

Dr. G. W. Crouter, retail druggist of Charlevoix, Mich., says: We have been selling Dr. King's New Discovery Electric Bitters, and Bucklen's Arnica Salve for six years. Have never handled remedies that sell as well, or give such universal satisfaction. There have been some wonderful cures effected by these medicines in this city. Several cases of pronounced consumption have been entirely cured by use of a few bottles of Dr. King's New Discovery, taken in connection with Electric Bitters. We guarantee them always. THE DEAD PAST.

BY M. VICTOR STALEY.

Years not for the joys of thy once happy childhood long,
Though dark be thy life, though clouded thy belief,
Not in the dead past with all its sad memories,
But in the bright future true happiness lies.
Why sigh for the past when the future will bring you
To those whom you love and for whom you may pray
Sad heart, would you give all the blessings of future
For one fleeting hour of thy childhood's returns?
Those whom you now mourn with such sincere sorrow,
Who long have passed to their dwelling above,
Now live in bright, blessed radiance of heaven,
And wait for thy coming with tenderest love.
The love of the past, if we try to recall them,
Will bring but a train of sad memories pain!
Twere better those dead years lay buried forever
In the grave which now hides them, O, let them remain.

The Life of a Scout.

BY WAIF.

But little time for refreshment and rest is given to scouts, especially on the eve of a great battle, or even while in the vicinity of an enemy well known to be largely superior in numbers and equipments.

Courier ride hastily, night and day, from the commanding generals to the quarters of corps and divisions.

Various changes of position were made by the infantry, under orders from Gen. eral Bragg; so that an officer of division when asked for his opinion as to our chances for success in the impending battle, replied:

"Unless Generals Morgan and Forrest can arrive in time" (the former was in Kentucky and the latter in West Tennessee) "to strike General Rosecrans' way, we are whipped!—for our men are already exhausted with marching and countermarching, and are in bad form for meeting the superior force which General Rosecrans has at hand."

The results of the battle of Murfreesboro, or Stone River, are matters of history; and our failure to pursue the advantage won, and the slaughter of the Kentuckians, under the gallant Breckinridge, on the memorable Friday evening—Black Friday—are charged to the debit side of the proper account.

Therefore "scouts" had but little to answer for on this occasion, as they could only criticise movements, and wish that they had a commander who was not so ready to run the wrong way.

It was not the intention to hold position to the north of Murfreesboro till General Rosecrans retired within the sheltering works around Nashville, but he always—no matter how counter to their judgment or wishes a retrograde movement might be. So we submitted to the inevitable, and joined General Bragg in another "masterly retreat."

Heartsick and footsore, our troops fell back to Shelbyville, after having punished General Rosecrans so severely in pursuit of his pressing us while in retreat.

Here they found kind, sympathizing friends, and hands ready to minister to their hurts, as well as to soothe their mortification at being ordered to throw away the fruits of a victory so nearly and so dearly won.

After reaching Shelbyville our scouts passed several days having clothing washed and repaired, having horses shod, and in making general preparations for the road, as we well knew that Major Walker would soon have us in the saddle, for he was a man of wonderfully earnest energy.

On the evening of the second day after we reached Shelbyville the Major communicated his design, and directed that the whole troop be in readiness for an early move.

But next morning we learned, with deep regret that Major Walker would be transferred to another department. Officers and men were much attached to him for his uniform kindness and urbanity, and we had the highest estimate of his energy and soldierly qualities.

Several of the men preferred to go with him, but others had ties in old Kentucky which held them away from the sea-coast.

Before our complete organization had ample opportunities for becoming acquainted with many of the citizens in and around Shelbyville, and we learned unmistakably that there were not a few of those good people whose ideas political did not accord with our own.

But the time for us to move had arrived, and, after taking leave of the Major and receiving from him an earnest "God bless you, boys," we dashed out of town by the road leading to Columbia.

About the time General Joseph Wheeler was promoted to rank as General of Division, and such officers as Forrest and Morgan were made subordinate to him!

Through this means we were near losing the services of General Forrest, who hesitated his resignation. The War Department would not accept his resignation, but created a new department, and he took his brigade to their new field of operations.

General Van Dorn, after capturing the Federal stores at Grand Junction, Hundoldt, etc., now arrived and took command of all our cavalry, and headquarters at Spring Hill, about twelve miles from Franklin, Tenn.

Our scouts were soon under his orders and proceeded to work from Nashville, from the waters of South Harpeth.

The position thus occupied was some eighteen miles in advance of cavalry outposts; but we were subject to little interference, as the Federal cavalry then came no further west than Big Harpeth, sweeping other from Nashville.

We soon became familiar with the country, and learned the by-paths so thoroughly that half a dozen regiments could not have frustrated us, if we could but get a-so closely guarded the fords and Big Harpeth as to have prevented our communication with our friends in the "City of Rocks."

Within two weeks after entering upon this new field we had established nine regular, reliable channels through which information was received of any noking of many other means too obtuse to mention "secret" intelligence, which we appeared to drink in greedily, but to which, in reality, but little heed was given.

One of the most serious obstacles with which we were forced to contend was the early appearance of detachments which were led by officers who were anxious to communicate more directly with friends in Nashville. These officers would obtain authority from superiors to "make a scout," and, as a rule, some of them were indiscreet, others cared but little for the success of their labor, and honor and fame dangled upon those who were headed in that section for regular scout duty.

The result of such made by these numerous "scouting parties" was to attract the enemy's attention toward the west, and lead them to guard, not only the Franklin road, but the fords of Nashville and crossing Big Harpeth to the west, lest we should thereby the dirt roads which run parallel to those turnpikes and crossed the river at intermediate points.

So that, in order to reach the north bank of Big Harpeth, we were compelled to cross it at night by swimming, or by means of a ford which was hidden by dense undergrowth, which not unfrequently was found lining the river banks, or by one which was hard to find to the rear of a field of corn.

At this early day, however, our superior knowledge of the topography of that region gave us a great advantage, despite the watchfulness and superior numbers of the enemy.

As could always manage to get across to the north bank of the river; but here our trouble and danger began; for we were not only liable to encounter a force of the enemy, but quite apt to run afwarf one of those self-constituted scouts who, ever ready and alert, were likely to act upon unerringly, and great any force not easily recognized; with a volley from shotguns loaded with buckshot, to be followed up with a fusillade from six-shooters.

"Mistakes" were of frequent occurrence, and, while they developed many curious characteristics in the different individuals, and resulted in many a hearty laugh and much quizzing afterward, were at the time of the most serious nature, as they were attended by great personal peril.

Early in February, 1863, a "scout" was ordered to repair to the vicinity of Nashville, Tenn., to strike a point on Hillsboro turnpike." Ten well-mounted men were selected men who knew their duty, and who were not likely to "lose their heads."

We had reached the vicinity of Big Harpeth, near the mouth of Little Harpeth, and opposite Peter Cartwright's farm.

A long narrow field of corn lay to the west of Mr. Cartwright's, between his residence and the north bank of the stream.

Along the west side of this corn-field for its whole length, was a deep pool of water known in the neighborhood as the Locust Hole.

At the foot of this pool was a ripple, upon which a fish-dam or trap had been built. Of course this dam served to render still deeper the water above it; while below the water was shallow, but swift in its course over small stones.

To cross the stream at this point was no great feat, and to reach the open ground on the east of Mr. C.'s residence and between the Hillsboro and the Franklin turnpikes was easy of accomplishment, and attended by no real danger.

We had crossed the stream, passed through Mr. C.'s cornfield, and proceeded to a point within easy reach of our pickets, when we were startled by:

"Halt! Who comes?"

Before time was given for reply, Johnson Vaughn, one of the best scouts in the band, had unmounted, and began to throw down the fence on our left, between the command and the stream, which lay throwing a distance of a mile to the west of our position.

"A friend," was replied.

"What command?" was asked.

"What do you mean by 'asking' people who are in search of a doctor?" was incoherently asked.

"Yes; if you will advance and satisfy us that you are a doctor, we will halt; for we may proceed on your way," was replied.

"Well, then, just what we didn't want to do, but we did wish Vaughn would hurry down that fence."

The order came, "Assist Vaughn, for they will not delay much longer."

"That's so, Lieutenant, for that's old Watkins Colonel of the Sixth Kentucky Cavalry, Federal, and he ain't going to waste much time in this ceremony."

"Lieutenant Commander: "Well, will you advance, or shall I send a squad of men after you? Decide quickly, for I shall not give you much more time."

"Hello, Colonel! I guess I won't go any further after 'a doctor' to-night, but I'll turn home and wait till next day."

"Good-night, Colonel."

"Good-night, Colonel! Halt! Countback here! Fire, men, if he don't halt!"

"Now, this it was thought that only one of our men the in advance had been seen, and, therefore, we were not covered up.

"But the fence was opened, and each man in the rear, dismounting and leading his horse through the gap, by diamondings, as we have before stated, to be seen, and mounting in the cornfield, under cover of the stalks, were all ready to prompt move upon the command to fire given.

"As the last speaker turned and dashed into the field, a small shower of balls fell around us, cutting the corn stalks on each side and in our front, with no other result than to make us pity our arms a little more industriously, until we distanced our pursuers, who were evidently reluctant as we learned afterward to leave the Hillsboro turnpike.

"Of course the firing had stirred up all the boys within its hearing, and produced the desired effect, which was a panic that it was "their move" toward Big Harpeth.

"We at once, and without a word, crossed on the river below our crossing place, and, after travelling for some distance, we were compelled to "slow up," as the banks were rough and precipitous. And, during our slower progress, we took advantage of the comparative silence to listen and to learn, if possible, whether we were being pursued by the enemy which had stampeded us.

"Our spirits was greatly heightened by hearing hoof strokes and the crackling of corn stalks on our right and below the ford on Big Harpeth!

"Of course, we imagined that the enemy knew the position of the ford, and were trying to head us off, and we became firmly impressed with the idea that we must get there first or be captured.

"Time was precious, which had been a good round one, became earnest in the extreme! It was every man for himself and "Davy" catch the hindermost.

"In order to cross with more facility Little Harpeth, we had deflected from the true course, so as to describe an arc; and it appeared to our heated imaginations that the enemy had taken the point of the arc, and, as they were riding as recklessly as we were, our apprehensions were duly increased.

"Vaughn, who was riding at the right of the column, exclaimed: "By gray, Lieutenant, they are outriding us, and the whole regiment is cutting us off from the ford! We will be forced out to the other pike, and find at least a company on duty there. Now we're in a nice pocket, ain't we? We must get out of our way through and we can turn back, but—darned if I'll surrender in here!"

The situation looked desperate, and only "heroic treatment" would meet the contingency.

The enemy was certainly outstripping us, and would lead us to the ford. No time was to be wasted in speculation, so with "Head of column follow leader," we turned to the right, so as to pass to rear of the enemy and strike the river at a point about two hundred yards below the ford.

At this point the river bank was some five feet above the surface of the water, which was a deep, deep pool, about fifteen between us and the safer side of the river. Down under this pressure, Pontiac was, as usual, irrepressible, and exclaimed:

"Now, boys, for a bath! We all need it, and won't be any the worse for it, unless a Yankee's bullet perforates the hide of some the water run in to drown us?"

With but little hesitation, for there was no delay in making the choice between a ducking and captivity, we plunged spurs into our horses and forced them to leap into the water—their heads held quartering up stream toward the other side of the river.

While we were thus engaged the troops at the ford dashed across, and, to our further anxiety, seemed bent upon cutting off our approach to the higher ground to the west.

We notice, however, that not more than thirty-five of the enemy continued in the rear; and are encouraged to hope that we may distance some of them, therefore having a mere equal show in the rapidly approaching struggle.

Here comes the enemy, approaching us diagonally and rapidly. With pistol in hand we ply the spur to our steeds, already beginning to feel the strain upon their resources but fire is withheld until we are at closer quarters, in the hope that we may still further decrease the number of our enemy, seemingly so entered upon intercepting our flight.

Our paths in the race have been convergent till now, a slight detour of about from its course until they become almost parallel and at about fifty yards apart. Thus we dash along, "topping" in the most approved style the logs and other impediments which would have been avoided, under ordinary circumstances.

The race grows fast and furious, each party riding to the best advantage. Thus far the speed developed has been nearly equal as to afford no material advantage in position to either party for the last few minutes.

Every rider watches to the front, striving to lift his horse at the leaps, and at the same time keeps a sharp eye on the movements of the enemy, that no one may get too much out of his course to get a shot into our ranks from a shorter distance. On thousand yards in our front are the hills, to reach which insures our safety. For they are heavily clad with undergrowth, under which will furnish us with a cover into which no enemy has yet penetrated. The intervening remaining manoeuvred is: Will our horses stand this race for a thousand yards?

"The boys" are ordered to close up, and to be ready for a last desperate rush. If we can but "hold our own" for two hundred yards, we will pass in front of our pursuers, for the ground becomes more broken in their immediate front. If they are unacquainted with this fact, and do not waver from their course, they will be compelled to check their speed, and have no opportunity to see the ground before forge ahead, and escape the toils, under cover of the friendly bushes, now but a short quarter in advance.

Ah! the enemy seems inclined to increase the pace, and to close the issue!

"Hope, look at that fellow pushing ahead. His horse has got the heels of ours, and the rider seems determined to close!"

"Well, if he must have it, let him stop a load of buckshot!" "I'll be the man for it! "See how the fellow rides!" "Let him alone close enough to make a sure shot."

"I would like to catch his horse, if it is not shot."

"Ha! he has got the heels of ours, and the rider seems determined to close!"

"Well, if he must have it, let him stop a load of buckshot!" "I'll be the man for it! "See how the fellow rides!" "Let him alone close enough to make a sure shot."

Important Items of Dress.

OH wear at home, where something comfortable, rather than showy, is required, a loose-fitting waist of cashmere, trimmed, so far as it requires trimming, with velvet, will be found one of the best inventions of the season. The fashion of wearing a waist of entirely different material, and most often of contrasting color, is growing in favor and adoption. A pretty waist we illustrate is much used this season in thin goods white and colored lawn, and materials largely adapted for making those numerous and pretty pattern dressing sacques can be purchased from $1.50 up to $50 per pattern.

As will be seen from these front and back views, the wider embroidery is utilized for small plastrons front and back, and the upper halves of the sleeves cut out of the narrower width. This waist is easily laundried when made of wash goods, but it is just as pretty in other materials during cool weather in the season.

Very odd and grotesque are the hats which the milliners have prepared for country-going dames and damsels. Much most of the designs are exceedingly pretty as well. Tall, round shapes are among these. They are trimmed with cream-colored mull, shirred on around the crown, both on top and upon the sides, broad ribbon bows being added at points where they will accentuate the effect. Some of them has two or more layers, one beneath the other, but each reaching further out than the last, of plat Val, the first breadth being gathered in to fast shirring on the head.

A dress very suitable for a matron or middle-aged lady in the country, or evening wear at home in town, is in black Chantilly lace, made up with great care and trimmed with gauze, for these lace dresses usually drape. The gauze is trimmed with a very wide plaited revers (fall, of course, of the lace itself, as no other material is perishable on a dress of this kind) and the skirt portion consists of a square, deeply dipped ruffle in front, with three carefully arranged back draperies. The tablier and draperies come so close to the floor as to say round that but two inches of any skirt is visible beneath. This is worn over a lining of black satin.

The popularity of these lace dresses has brought about new and handsome styles in sleeves. A plain, tight-fitting sleeve was never appropriate for lace. The full lace sleeves we illustrate are at once artistic and graceful, especially becoming to thin arms, and add a soft roundness to plump ones. The tight-fitting cuff may be made of silk covered with lace, but it is most often made of velvet or satin only.

Another sleeve is simply a deep puff of lace, set with only one seam, and, when very full, is quite without a lining. The wrist is stayed just above a frill of lace with a satin ribbon fastened in a bow at the back.

These sleeves are sometimes caught up twice, making two puffs, but I prefer the single one.

It is at those garments which do not cost a fortune that the public that the wisest efforts of the dress-reformers are now directed—the underclothing. This they hold, and with considerable reason, to be about as bad in its construction and arrangements as it can be, and they exert themselves to relieve it of all its worst features.

The most serious charges brought against it are: That it is unevenly distributed over the entire body, and so produces an unequal temperature upon the various parts of the body; that it compresses, painfully the tender vital parts of the wearer; that its weight, in hanging chiefly from the hips, is effecting much harm upon the body, as all clothing should hang from the shoulders.

These things are certainly true, in the main, and the remedies advised for them, if not entirely efficient, are certainly a great advance in the right direction.

In order to secure that equable warmth upon the whole body which is essential to health, the garments worn should evenly cover both the limbs and trunk. This result is effected by union suits, the first of knitted manufacture, and the second, constituting the ordinary drawers and chemise, combined, is of muslin, linen, or cambric, while the third consists of a loose, heavier pair of drawers, attached also to a waist above, which is made to reach to take the part of a petticoat. This system of clothing not only evenly distributes heat and relieves pressure and warmth from the waist, but it suspends the garments from the shoulders. Beyond this, the reformers prohibit strap garters, which so compress the legs as to interfere seriously with the circulation, and advise strips of tape or elastic suspending the stockings indirectly from the shoulders, as a waist-band for their support is now so injurious as to induce a great many to dispense with it altogether. Tight and high-heeled boots are also tabooed, and the shoe is allowed to be so loose that the corset is not requisite.

Marvelous Strength.

It is always good to know of a hero whose deeds are recorded, not as mental or moral, perfection. Garibaldi was a man fitted to stand beside Mazzini and Cavour, and yet he was Homeric fashion, a power which always tended to a healthy public action. The frame of his athletic powers:

His triceps, or shoulder muscles, were enormous. In repose, his right arm had two half occasionts sticking up beneath the muscle, which, when he pulled, used Two of the Life Guards' blades, forged for the purpose, were bent double.

Many a time have I seen that awful sabre sweeping right, left, like clockwork, and the moved limbs, the head, seated on his old white charger, and leaving a lane for those who followed him close behind.

"Armate, armati!" rang from his lips. All the while, the clear, trumpet voice rose high above the loudest artillery fire.

His strength was simply Herculean. Lobe one night he was passing on foot, with a soldier, by a house, where an unlighted and dangerous part of Naples, infested with lazaroni in the pay of Francis II. Suddenly from either side two men sprang simultaneously upon the soldier, and, before their blades, raised to strike, could fall, Garibaldi, who was behind, had thrust, raised him in air to the full extent of his arms.

He then knocked them together two or three times, and let them fall on the pavement, saying, "The poor fools! have had their lesson."

FARM AND GARDEN.

FODDER CORN—THE VENTILATION OF STACKS AND MOWS.

Symptoms of and Cures for Roup, Indigestion and Crop-Bound Fowls—How to Feed a Working Horse—The Poor Man's Barn in Arkansas.

Our cut shows the plan for a cheap barn which has been tested by an Arkansas farmer who considers it worthy of imitation. He has named it "The poor man's barn," and gives in Southern Cultivator a description of it, which is here repeated for the benefit of readers who think it convenient and at the same time a cheap barn.

A POOR MAN'S BARN.

The main building is 20x40 feet, with a shed fifteen feet wide on one side and one end, making the entire building 55x55 feet, and is built as follows: Set eight large white oak posts, fifteen feet long, and set them in the ground three feet, one at each corner and two between on the sides of main building. These must be square or two by and all on a level; on the side posts place hewn plates 4x6 inches, and then 'our pieces crossed from each post to one on the opposite side; then put in smaller posts, fifteen feet from side to end posts, for the shed; they should be seven feet above the ground. By putting posts where marked in the plan, 2x6 inch joist will do for plates. Now put up your rafters on main building, and then spike the end of shed rafters to them; it can be fastened by spiking 2x4 or 2x6 pieces on the posts to nail the siding to; the inside can be arranged to suit convenience.

In the barn shown in the cut the main part, 20x40 feet, is used for hay; the side shed has a granary 15x20 feet, and six stalls for horses or mules, three on each side of a six foot passage, the horses heads being next to the passage. The mangers are made by setting posts in the ground and nailing boards on the inside, and make partitions between the stalls in the same way. The shed at the end is for five cows; there is a manger made the entire length of the shed on posts set in the ground, which come up high enough to keep the cattle, and there are no partitions between main building and shed, except at the granary.

Sick Fowls.

Complaints are unusually frequent this season in regard to sick fowls. In nine cases out of every ten reported the disease is roup in one of its several stages, and it is caused from neglected colds, untoward exposure to cold and wet, roosting in draughts or confinement in ventilated houses. The very first symptom of this dreaded disease is a hoarseness and peculiar noise made by the chick, which, for lack of a better term, may be called a "sneeze." A general dumpishness and disinclination to eat. At this stage if prompt and efficient treatment be given the birds can be saved.

As roup is highly contagious, the first thing to be done is to isolate sick birds from the well ones. The writer separates from the flock the birds as soon as they begin to sneeze, confine them in a room apart by themselves. The birds are fed on cooked food, in which is mixed a little cayenne pepper and spirits of camphor, while in their drinking water is put Douglas mixture at the rate of two tablespoonfuls to a gallon of water.

At the second stage of the disease the cold has developed an offensive discharge from the nostrils and eyes, an offensive breath, and refusal usually to either eat or drink. Even at this stage the birds may be saved by administering roup pills—German roup pills are a popular kind—according to directions, keeping up Douglas mixture in the water in which has been dropped a little carbolic acid. When the third stage is reached, at which the head has become much swollen, lanceture the head, as it is folly to doctor the and ulcers appear, it is folly to doctor the fowls. They ought to be killed immediately and their bodies buried.

When once the roup, even in its first stage, has appeared, it is a wise precaution to feed the well fowls a little sulphur in their food, and tincture of iron in the drinking water. We have given sulphur the more marked symptoms of roup and the remedies that have proven effectual with us. Symptoms differ somewhat according to the violence of the attacks, but the offensive breath, the sore throat and mouth, the mucous discharge from nostrils and eyes, will, one or more of them, mark the disease. Roup remedies are legion, but preventive means are best. It will pay every one who keeps fowls to have on hand roup pills and Douglas mixture; these two remedies have been proven beyond doubt to be excellent, and there is no hesitancy in recommending them.

Indigestion, due to cold sometimes, but usually to a too stimulating diet, may be mitigated by cutting down the diet to soft, bland food and a laxative of castor oil. Indigestion causes sometimes what is termed "crop bound." The food does not pass into the stomach, and the crop becomes swollen and hard, which renders the bird restless, with inclination to toss the head about and draw up the crop. The treatment for this is a little warm water forced down the throat and gentle kneading of the crop; then give a teaspoonful of castor oil, and leave the rest to nature. Feed very soft food only, and allow but little water.

Food Required by a Working Horse.

The amount of food required by a working horse must be adapted to the work performed. Food is needed to sustain life first, and then to repair the waste of the muscular system caused by the work. Henry Stewart, good authority in such matters, says that to sustain the vital action and force a horse of 1,200 pounds requires about twenty-five pounds of hay per day. If the animal is working hard there should be added to this a certain quantity of grain food, easily digestible and containing a sufficient amount of albuminous matter to repair the waste of the muscles, and enough starch or other carbonaceous matter to sustain the accelerated respiration produced by the work. A great many experiments and practical experiences have shown that a 1,200 pound horse worked to his full capacity will need for his daily food pounds of digestible matter consisting of sixteen pounds of carbonaceous matter and four pounds of albuminous matter. As about three-fifths of the food consumed is digested, the amount of grain given should be about twenty-seven pounds in all, of which 40 per cent. should be hay of the best quality.

Without going into details Mr. Stewart tells, in Rural New Yorker, that the sixteen pounds of grain food may be made up of eight pounds of corn and oat meal, three pounds of linseed cake meal and five pounds of mill feed. To secure the best digestion of this food the hay should be cut and wetted slightly and mixed with the other feed finely ground. Linseed oil cake meal new process is highly albuminous, containing 37.8 per cent. of digestible albuminoids, and must therefore be fed with caution. Three to five pounds per day may be given safely, if the meal is old process it contains 10 per cent. of fat or oil, which is healthful in its action upon the animal, and by a proper mixture with corn and oatmeal five to eight pounds per day may be given with advantage.

One Recipt for Ficking Eggs.

A World correspondent says: "For seven years past I have pickled my sun-plus summer eggs from my henery, also from the neighbors, when eggs were the cheap est. Following is my receipt, and as a cracked or rotten egg will float, only sound ones are put away: Two pounds of rock lime, 4 pounds of fine salt, 5 pounds of water. Use enough cold water to cover the lime and salt; second day put in enough of the water which must be hot. When cool pour off into a bowl and add a little of the thick lining water as you proceed to fill the bowl with eggs."

Fodder Corn.

Fodder corn, both for feeding green and in a dry state, has become one of the staple crops. Sweet corn is a sort very generally grown for fodder. Sweet corn is, however, more difficult to cure, being liable to mold, and for this reason some farmers practice sowing field corn when the fodder is required for winter use. Blount's prolific corn, owing to its large yield, has proven a popular sort in some sections for fodder.

Corn for fodder is sown broadcast by some, but progressive farmers contend that better results are gained when the seed is drilled in, with sufficient space between the rows to insure the air and sunshine having free access to the plants.

For early feeding, the first planting of corn for fodder should be early, of course, and seed is put in, however, during the latter part of June and early part of July, with good results, for winter use.

FIG. 1—FRAME FOR VENTILATOR.

The difficulty of curing fodder corn in its immature state tempts many farmers into permitting it to become too ripe for good curing. The stage of flowering is considered the best time to cut other forage crops, and corn appears to be no exception. The rule very generally observed among experienced growers is to cut fodder corn for drying in the early blossom of the tassel. At whatever stage the fodder is harvested, it is wise to have the crop cut before it has been touched by frost.

Stacking is considered the surest method for preserving the fodder. There are three requisites for keeping the fodder in good condition, fresh ventilation, thorough central ventilation, and such an arrangement of the bundles in the stack that rain or snow cannot penetrate, but must run off as the water falls from the roof of a shingled house.

FIG. 2—VENTILATOR FOR STACKS.

A useful arrangement, common in many sections, for the ventilation of stacks and mows is here shown and applicable to the curing of fodder. Fig. 1 shows a frame made of strips of wood, put together with small carriage bolts. The length of the section is three or four feet. Fig. 2 illustrates the manner in which the sections are put together. A stack or mow may have a column of these ventilators in the center; a large one may have three or four of them; in a mow in the barn there may be as many as are useful, two or three or more, as the case may be.

In stacking fodder corn it is safest to make the stacks small. Three of these sections placed together in a column as shown in Fig 2 are sufficient for a stack containing three tons of fodder, and which would be about fourteen feet high. The sheaves should be small and the stack somewhat open at the bottom, so as to freely admit currents of air. The top of the stack may be finished off with straw or a hay cap.

Of the hundreds of leaks on every farm but few, if any, are more damaging than a leaky stable floor. Have the floor tight, and some kind of absorbent on it to take up and hold the liquid manure. This is for men who have no cellar.

TOWNS WITH ODD NAMES.

Eccentricity Steps In with All the States When Patriotism Runs Short.

When the people of a town in this country set about naming their postoffice there seems to be no limitation put upon them by Uncle Sam, except that there cannot be more than one postoffice of the same name in the same state. The presidents have all been honored. Washington leads the list with 32, Jackson follows with 28. The hero of New Orleans, however, beats the Father of his Country in the number of names derived from his name, he having 44, while there are only 17 for Washington. But there are 23 Mount Vernons, against 9 Hermitages and 20 Monticellos. Jefferson is honored with 35 and 19 derivatives. There are 26 Monroes, 23 derivatives; 24 Madisons, 21 derivatives; Adams, 13; derivatives, 20; Harrison, 17; 13 derivatives; 4 Tippecanoes, and Tyler too, 4; Van Buren, 11; Taylor, 21; 33 derivatives; Polk, 4; Pierce, 4; Fillmore, 16; Buchanan, 13; Lincoln, 27; derivatives, 14; Johnson, 8 and 12; Grant, 16; derivatives, 29; Hayes, 8; Garfield, 23; Arthur, 19, and Cleveland, 18. Skeleton of a Squaw.

The continued action of the wind on the sand bluff at Union Pier, Mich., recently uncovered the skeleton of an Indian squaw, apparently buried there long ago. About the wrists were two pairs of bracelets made of a mixture of silver and copper metal, and by the head a pair of earrings of the same material and a drill or movter of small beads apparently made from bone and some kind of shell. The pieces of metal constituting the bracelets were formed into a thick coating of verdigris. There was also a round iron box, about three inches in diameter and an inch deep, but entirely eaten by rust, and wrapped about it a covering of some coarse cloth, the threads of which were plainly seen in the rust.—New York Sun.

Cocaine as a Cure for Morphine Habit.

Bormemann, in The Deutsche Medical Zeitung, states that the victim of morphine looks to cocaine for help, and, mistaking its effects for those of morphine abstinence, seeks to remove them by more cocaine, until, unless he becomes enlightened, he finally kills himself. A case in point is known to him. He was cured of six cases known to him this was the result.

THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

Secretary Lamar's Revocation of the Withdrawals of Lands by Railroad Companies—A Vast Empire Restored to the People for Settlement and Improvement.

A WASHINGTON dispatch says "the railroad indemnity lands have been restored to the public domain. The step foreshadowed by the letter of the President last April to the Secretary of the Interior in the Railroad Miller case has been taken. The Secretary overrules all the special pleas made by the railroad companies and throws these lands open to settlers, from whom they have been withheld without warrant of law, indeed, in violation of law—for periods varying from eight to ten up to twenty-five or thirty years. The General Land Office estimates that there have been withdrawn as indemnity lands in the interest of railroads 52,993,000 acres, an area very nearly the size of Minnesota, and that there are now held apart from the public domain under these withdrawals about 25,000,000 acres, or rather more land than there is in the State of Indiana. This, be it remembered, is entirely aside from the mighty empire that has been given outright to the railroad companies. The opinions of Secretary Lamar give effect to the mind of the Supreme Court that land grants shall be construed strictly as against the grantees, and that nothing passes by them except just what Congress expressly or by necessary implication gives to the corporations. They affirm that the Department of the Interior is quite as much bound to consider the welfare of the people as the welfare of the railroad companies.

MURDERED BY A CHILD.

A Colored Boy of Eight Years Shoots and Kills a Little Girl in South Carolina.

A COLUMBIA (S. C.) special says: "A peculiar murder was committed in Lancaster County by an 8-year-old colored boy. He and his sister and another girl about 3 years of age were eating watermelon. They had a dispute, and, the boy being angry, while the girls had their backs turned, reached down an old double-barreled gun, cocked it, and approached them in an angry manner, saying he was going to kill them both. He aimed the gun at the girls, but he was hardly able to hold it up, and before he could shoot his sister caught him by the arm and begged him not to kill her. The little devil finally agreed to put the gun up, but while doing so, either by accident or purposely, he discharged the weapon, which was heavily loaded with buckshot. The charge passed through his sister's arm and took effect in the breast of the other girl, killing her instantly. This makes the third murder in South Carolina in the past few months committed by children under ten years of age."

THE NATIONAL GAME.

A Hot Fight for the Base-Ball Championship.

OVER twenty thousand people attended the two Chicago-Detroit base-ball games in Chicago on Saturday and Monday last, both of which were won by the present champions by the respective scores of 8-2 and 6-4. By winning these games Chicago tied Detroit for first place. The clubs in the league race occupy the positions shown in the following table:

Clubs.	Won.	Lost.	Percent.
Chicago	50	30	.625
Detroit	50	32	.609
Cleveland	47	32	.595

Small Bank Notes for Circulation.

The United States Treasury, having accumulated a supply of $1 and $2 silver certificates sufficient to meet the current heavy demand, has arranged for the prompt delivery of these notes to banks, bankers, and others making the required deposit. The issue of these notes has been suspended since the 1st of May last.

Telegraphic Brevities.

A WASHINGTON telegram to a New York paper asserts that the Government is preparing to begin civil suits against the Pacific Railway people to recover the amounts they are alleged to have defrauded the Treasury of. The plunder is said to aggregate $75,000,000.

GEORGE W. JULIAN, Surveyor General of New Mexico, in his annual report declares that not less than 4,000,000 acres of public land in that Territory have been fraudulently appropriated, and denounces the Maxwell land grant as a colossal steal.

PROFESSOR TALBERT, the balloonist, made an ascension at Colfax, Ill., and when about 1,000 feet high the balloon took fire. The aeronaut descended in safety, however.

UNITED STATES SENATOR THURMAN, who was sent to jail at Woodstock, Va., for contempt of court, but was released the same night by a mob of his friends.

THE EASTERN STATES.

HENRY S. IVES & CO., of New York, have made an assignment to Sullivan A Crowell, the announcement causing intense excitement on the Stock Exchange. The liabilities are figured at between $10,000,000 and $20,000,000, with the assets slightly in excess of the latter amount. Bulls and bears seemed overjoyed at the news, believing that the stock market would show an immediate improvement.

Forty striking miners of the Alden Coal Company, near this city, attacked thirty men who had taken their places in the Alden mines, says a Wilkesbarre (Pa.) dispatch. Many women also took a hand in the fight. Michael Christ and Jacob Horton, two non-union men, were fatally injured. Their assailants, Andrew Sipkins, Andrew Newark, and John Rossof Ronowski, were arrested. The fight lasted half an hour. The women manned the non-union men with fence-rails, and their husbands stood stones and pickets. Fifteen persons were wounded on both sides, but only the two mentioned will die of their injuries.

THE WESTERN STATES.

A PORTSMOUTH (Ohio) dispatch says: "The application for a new trial in the case of Alf. McCoy, convicted of murdering Dr. Northup, was overruled and McCoy was sentenced to the Penitentiary for life. Execution of sentence was stayed until the next regular term of court, which begins Oct. 10, in order that his attorneys may appeal. Farmer McCoy's fame was called and his attorneys asked for a change of venue. It was afterward agreed to continue the case until the October term."

THE convicted Cook County Commissioners were taken into court, Thursday, and Messrs. McGaughey, Oliver, Casselman, Geiss, McCarthy, Kiehm, and Lynn were sentenced. McGaughey was sentenced to two years in the Penitentiary at Joliet, the others being fined $1,000 and costs each. McGaughey was taken to Joliet. Brother Kiehm wept copiously when arraigned. He read a written statement to the court in which he rehearsed certain important services he had rendered the public in his capacity of a County Commissioner, and asked to be dealt with as mercifully as possible. State's Attorney Grinnell spoke a good word for Kiehm, in view of the assistance he rendered the State during the trial, and at Mr. Grinnell's suggestion a fine of $1,000 and costs was imposed. McGaughey caused a written statement to be read in court, in which he affirmed his entire innocence of the charges against him.

Twenty-four firemen were working in the ruins of some burned buildings at St. Louis the wife fell in, burying seven men, three of whom were taken out dead. All the other victims were seriously injured, and one at least will die.

A MARQUETTE (Mich.) dispatch reports a terrible disaster on the new extension of the Northwestern Road to Watersmeet, near Norway, Mich. A crew of men, after finishing building a water-tank, fired it to see how it would test it. While the men were sitting around eating dinner the tank suddenly burst with terrible force, killing six men instantly and badly injuring six others.

Rains throughout Michigan, from Sturgis to St. Ignace, says a Detroit dispatch, have put out all the forest fires that were threatening the destruction of the towns near the forests. No fears are now expressed of any disaster.

THREE miners were instantly killed Thursday at the Cleveland mine, near Ishpeming, Mich.

FRED HOFF, alias Wilson, a murderer, was executed by shooting in the yard of the Penitentiary, near Salt Lake City, U. T. He was calm and self-possessed, and smiled to the last. At the first discharge two bullets pierced his heart, and death was instantaneous.

CHICAGO firms have determined to erect extensive packing-houses at Sioux City, Iowa, early next spring.

THE west-bound express on the Southern Pacific was ditched thirty miles from Tucson, Arizona, by robbers, who plundered the express and fled. The amount taken has not transpired.

THE exact loss of life by the railway disaster at Chatsworth, Ill., is still in doubt. It is probable that the number of killed and fatally injured will reach one hundred. More than twenty persons were seriously hurt, and many sustained slight injuries. Several of the wounded were also badly scalded. All of the wounded who were able to travel have been removed from Chatsworth, Piper City, and Forest to Peoria or to their homes. The bodies of the killed were also taken to Peoria, and such as had not been claimed by relatives were interred by the company in that city. The Coroner began an inquest on Friday. The State Board of Railway Commissioners also began an investigation. The theory that the train was fired by incendiaries for the purpose of wrecking the train and robbing the passengers has increased the mystery of the cause of the disaster. Several of the victims who are still at Chatsworth cannot give any information. Prof. Baker, Professor of Civil Engineering in the University of Illinois, has made a careful personal examination of the engineering features of the wreck. He pronounces the theory of the cause of the accident as without a shadow of probability. As to the condition of the railway itself, Prof. Baker positively affirms that it is of the metal type, and was, without doubt, amply strong to carry the train except for the fire. He thinks probably the firing of the bridge was caused by the fire left by the acting gang, who, by their own testimony, burning wooden an eighth of a mile away late in the afternoon, and a change of wind drove the fire toward the bridge.

CONCHITOS GILLESPIE, who was running the Southern Pacific train that was robbed near Tucson, Arizona, says an El Paso dispatch, tells the following story:

The train was running thirty miles an hour, when he saw a man on the grassy slope, which sloped gradually to the track and a red light was flashed in the engineer's face. He tried to stop the train, but by that time the switch leading to the gravel-pit had been thrown open and the train was diverted from the main track, the engine being thrown into the gravel-pit. At the same time there was firing. A number of masked men stood by the track. Conductor Gillespie asked Manning, if it was advisable to stop the train. Manning thought not, as the train had already slackened its speed so much that it could not hurt anybody. Gillespie then ordered the train to be backed up to the Pullman, which was being dragged along by the robbers, who had attached a rope to it. He did not know how much they got out of the express car. The robbers then commenced to blow the road safe in the car and they took a number of packages. Conductor Gillespie stated that the train had a stock containing the Mexican dollars was carried across a small bridge and there was a loss of $1,000 and costs was imposed. McGaughey caused a written statement to be read in court, in which he affirmed his entire innocence of the charges against him.

A MADISON (Wis.) dispatch says that Richard Eagleston, a farmer living near Verona, Dane County, had a thrilling experience with a large spotted adder, which would have terminated fatally for Eagleston, but for the timely assistance of his daughter. Eagleston, who is eighty years old and partial to a nap in the afternoon, was taking his farm accompanied by his daughter, when he came to a place where the road ran by a roadway, the snake, which as the team approached, was coiled in the middle of the road, lashed some of the horses and the horses receive poisonous wounds, and therefore slightly injured the wagon, and then preached the venomous creature darting forward and striking at the horses. The horses became uncontrollable and ran away with the wagon. It darted its fangs into its victim's legs, fastening its venomous fangs deep into the flesh. The terrified daughter, fearing attack, leaped from the wagon and ran and gave the alarm at the first farm house. The farmer hastened back to the road, and, after a severe struggle, in which the snake fought desperately, succeeded in killing the reptile and rescuing his father, whose face was purple from the constantly increasing venom. Eagleston was taken to his home from the station, so he to be out of sight of the curious public, who little know what was in the wind, and, when the doctor came, the bodies was switched into the regular express train, and was soon on the way to Peoria.

A Peoria telegram of Saturday says:

Yesterday was a day of mourning in Peoria—crape on the doors, the dead literally blocked the undertaking establishments, and over the city the sadness and horror of the calamity are spreading with a sweep that, from several miles in the city who lost friends and relatives in the disaster, where cannot be found a foot remote it will not do to mention, for whom the bell tolls. The dead, as stated, numbered 78, and not more than three could attend to, the last night the death-carts were rumbling from the city, some bearing the dead or dying as 12:30 and 2:00. In many instances the dead were taken to their late homes. But the condition of the bodies was such, owing to the intense heat, the fire, the crushing weight and the great heat of the weather, that it was necessary to send for the undertakers to remove them.

The number killed in the Chatsworth disaster, or who have died since, is now "officially" stated at 76. The seriously wounded numbered 120, and the slightly injured 15; making a grand total of 400 killed and injured. Several of the victims who are still at Chatsworth cannot give any information. Prof. Baker, Professor of Civil Engineering in the University of Illinois, has made a careful personal examination of the engineering features of the wreck. He pronounces the theory of the cause of the accident as without a shadow of probability. As to the condition of the railway itself, Prof. Baker positively affirms that it is of the metal type, and was, without doubt, amply strong to carry the train except for the fire. Twice That Number of Persons Wounded, Many of Them Fatally.

A Heavily Laden Excursion Train Crashes Through a Charred Bridge in the Night.

The Wreck Takes Fire and Is Extinguished After a Desperate Fight.

(SPECIAL TO THE JOURNAL.)

One of the most terrible accidents within the memory of man occurred three miles east of Chatsworth, on the Toledo, Peoria and Western Railroad, Friday night. An excursion train of ten cars, carrying a large number of people, was ditched and burned and 75 persons were killed and twice as many wounded, some of the persons were instantly killed and about one hundred and twenty-five or less scorched to death.

The train consisted of engines 21 and 13, baggage car, a special car, two coaches, and six sleepers. Two and a half miles east of Chatsworth there is a long bridge across the east of Forest, there is a small culvert or bridge, at least fourteen feet wide and fifteen feet deep. The people who current the train, and who had been warned of the danger of such a train, had charred the sills and ties, leaving the rails and bridge as they were. At

THE Democratic party is allied to the cause of labor devoted to it, and ruled by it, and at the same time it believes in our American institutions and is capable of both defending and developing them.—New York Star.

The Detroit Evening News celebrated its fourteenth anniversary by issuing a double number, and giving a detailed statement of the growth of that enterprising newspaper. Its daily average circulation is over forty thousand.

WHEN Mr. Blaine makes another war tariff speech to a pig-iron audience in Pennsylvania, will he frankly confess whether he bought any clothes or other stuff in Europe in order to escape the payment of duties?—St. Louis Post Dispatch.

England has 446 inhabitants to the square mile; Germany has 213. Germany has a "protective" tariff; England has not. The average pay of English woge-earners is 50 per cent. higher than that of the same class in Germany.—Grand Rapids Democrat.

IF it were Mrs. Cleveland now, there would be no doubt about who would be elected. By her intelligence, beauty, independence, modesty, and yet absence of mock modesty, she has "entwined" herself, so to speak, around the American heart.—Chicago Mail.

The fourth annual reunion of the Soldiers' and Sailors' association of Northwest Michigan will be held at Reed City on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, Sept. 6, 7, and 8. The names of state senator "Lew" G. Palmer, Commander L. G. Rutherford, Hon. M. Brown, Gen R. M. Cutcheon, Col. Chas. D. Long and Judge A. B. Morse are among the speakers.

PROF. SUMNER says the best way for a man to get a living who does not want to work is to get between two men who does, carry stuff from one to the other at a heavy tariff both ways, or to make goods for them and levy a tax, or have the government do it, on like articles purchased anywhere else. This is protection for the man who does not want to work, but it is extortion as applied to those who do work. Like all tariffs to protect one class, it is robery of others.

The Nation says: Authoritative democratic reports from Massachusetts are to the effect that the state will send a solid Cleveland delegation to the next democratic national convention, and that it is upon the record of the Cleveland administration that the party will base its hopes of carrying the state at the election in November. We presume that there is not another New England state from which inquiry would fail to bring similar reports. The south is known to be in the same frame of mind, and we have yet to hear of a western state which is likely to select an anti-Cleveland delegation next year. Where, then, is the influence of the anti-Cleveland press exerted? Its utterances are quoted nowhere save in the Blaine papers.

Working for Cleveland.

The Grand Army of the Republic men are working nobly for the re-election of Grover Cleveland. Yesterday a detachment of that organization which was parading at Wheeling, W. Va., refused to pass under a portrait of the president which was suspended across the street, but made a detour and lowered their colors as they did so. This is an example of Puttnam that should bring joy to the heart of Clevelandphobists at Des Moines. The dispatches state that the action of the Grand Army of the Republic caused great feeling at the time. The principal feeling it caused however will make itself apparent a little over a year from now. Such acts cannot result in anything but heavy defections from the party represented by the Grand Army of the Republic.—Chicago News.

Michigan Mention

It is reported that the officers of the G. R. & I. railroad are taking extra precaution against accidents, and are examining and testing the bridges on their lines.

Four persons were arrested last Friday in the Canadian Sault village for "shoving the guey," and having it on their persons. The two Sault villages are being flooded with counterfeit Canadian money, and have been for several weeks.

The largest raft ever towed in the world, reached Bay City Tuesday afternoon from Au Train, Lake Superior, in tow of the tugs Gladiator and Mocking Bird. It contained about 8,000,000 feet and was worth a cool $100,000. The logs are the property of Mosher & Fisher, Foss & Leiter and others of Bay City. The logs were towed down in a bag boom.—Cheboygan Tribune.

A petrified anchor was grappled up near Green Bay a few days since, and it is presumed to be the Griffin's lost 208 years ago. It was constructed from a young maple tree having three branches from the root. An other bar was fastened on resembling a round top wooden stool. On the bottom was fastened the flukes, which were bars of oak crossing each other and filled between with stone to weigh it down.—Cheboygan Tribune.

The Detroit dry dock company is constructing a mammoth steamer for running the straits during the winter. She is 290 feet over all with 50 feet beam and a depth of 24 feet 3 inches. Her model is of the double tender type, with propelling wheels at either end. Her stern wheel is used for pushing and her bow wheel for pulling her ahead, and for breaking ice. This will be the first practical test of a stem wheel as an ice breaking adjunct in a boat exposed to the rigors of winter on the northern lakes. The machinery of the boat will comprise two engines and three boilers. The smaller engine to be used for the stem wheel, is 26 by 48 and 40 inch stroke. It will be operated only when it is necessary to break the ice in the path of the boat. The stem wheel which is ten feet in diameter, will not be required in summer, and will be taken out when the ice breaks up. The after engine is 28x48, with 48 inch stroke, and drives a wheel 12 feet in diameter. Her boilers are double ended, 18 feet by 11 feet 6 inches, and are built to fire from both ends. They will have a working pressure of 100 pounds. The engine is of 4,000 horse power. It is expected that the craft will be completed by January and will carry ten cars.

The Richest Man.

In speaking of the wealth of some of the ancients, you class Tiberius as the richest man, at $118,125,000, and give that of Crœsus, the Lydian, at about $8,000,000. You have not mentioned one wealthier than them all, namely, Pythius, son of Aty, the Lydian, who possessed in silver and gold together $34,816,000, which, added to his possession of land and slaves at a proportionate value, would swell his wealth to about $860,000,000. I mean his gold at the Doric value of $5.22; if reckoned at the value of the stater stolen it would give him in coin $6,038,000, and with slaves and lands in proportion, a wealth of over $120,000,000. This man Pythius, without touching his silver and gold, entertained at the city of Calaune the army of Xerxes, over 5,000,000 strong, in his invasion of Greece, and on a previous occasion made King Darius, Xerxes' father, a magnificent present—a gold plane tree and vine. This Pythius, then, was the wealthiest man in the world, and it is doubtful if there has been any one before or since to equal him.—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Breathing Through the Mouth.

Those people who breathe through the mouth draw dust constantly into their lungs, where it remains permanently; for Professor Tyndall has shown that the exhaled air is absolutely free from dust particles. Professor Rosam asserts that city people at the age of 20 usually have in their lungs a whole grammar of calcareous dust, which they can never again get rid of, and which may engender dangerous disease. Few people know that their skins as well as their lungs need a constant supply of oxygen. The skin, as well as the lungs, breathes and purifies the blood, as is shown by the fact that the arterial blood which goes to the skin does not turn purple and dark elsewhere, but remains red and pure.—The Epoch.

A Metaphysician's Habits.

The famous Immanuel Kant was a very methodical man in all his habits. It is said of him by Heine that getting up in the morning, drinking coffee, writing, lecturing and walking, all had exact time; and the neighbors knew that it was just 3 o'clock when Immanuel Kant, in his gray overcoat, a rattaceu cane in his hand, appeared in his house door, and strode toward that little linden avenue which to this very day is called, after him, the "philosopher's walk." Furthermore, eight times he used to go up and down there in all seasons, and if the weather was dull, or if dark clouds predicted a rainfall, old Lampe, his servant, was seen walking behind him, carefully anxious, with a long umbrella under his arm.—Queries.

Virtues of Indian Corn.

Indian corn contains a large amount of nitrogen, has anti-constipating qualities, is easily assimilated, cheap and very nutritious. A doctor of note declares that a course of Indian meal, in the shape of Johnny cake, hoe cake, corn or pone bread and meals, relieved by copious draughts of pure cow's milk, to which, if inclined to dyspepsia, a little lime water may be added, will make a life, now a burden, well worth the living; and you need no other treatment to correct your nervousness, brighten your vision and give you sweet and peaceful sleep.—Exchange.

G. McDonald and Charles Norton left on the Friant, last Wednesday for St. Ignace.

A good job of grubbing etc., has been done on the new road which was put through last summer; commencing at the corner of E. G. Jarman's eighty and running east to F. E. Miller's. It is now quite passable, and is the most direct and level route from Ironton to Advance.

W. H. Jarman and sister Miss Laura, of this place, spent Sunday and Monday with their uncle, Nathan Jarman, at Petoskey.

Leroy Sheldon's machine was threshing the grain on the mountain road last week and this.

W. S. Stripp, we notice, carries his hand in a sling.

If there is not the full amount of news, this week empire at the ferry, as we were absent part of the week.

The H. H. society will hold regular meetings beginning in September.

The show, given by Prof. Ferguson, at Schoffel's hall, last Wednesday evening, on the violin, is reported to have been good.

Last Thursday evening, the W. C. T. U. gave an ice cream social at the M. E. Church, for the benefit of the church. A good time is reported.

W. H. Jarman, has purchased the entire shoe makers tools, of David Norton, of this place. Bill says now look out for some fine quality of shoe making. Eh! dont he?

Labor's Annual Holiday.

Organized labor of northern Michigan having decided to celebrate Labor Day, September 5th, we call on you to lay your aside implements of toil on that day, and to join with us in celebrating this grand national holiday of labor, and make it the greatest feature of the year. The new holiday will be duly celebrated all over the United States, the Canadas, and the members of labor organizations here are determined not to be behind, therefore we urge all the labor organized in this vicinity to come forward and take part in this exhibition of strength and unity of labor forces in this section of the state. The main feature of the celebration will be a grand English barbecue for which a large roast ox will be offered.

No date on the calendar is so important, so dear to the people as Labor day. Other holidays—reminders of sectional hate and bloody wars and human sacrifices—pale in the light of this harbinger of peace and good will.

Let us commemorate the day in a befitting manner, with a display of enthusiasm and gladdfaction appropriate for such an occasion; and let it be for labor's hosts the practical inauguration of an era of recognition, reconciliation and reward.

The co operation of every division of labor is earnestly requested—Knights of Labor, trades unionists, all protective and benevolent organizations of working men and women.

Shoulder to shoulder we will march before the strongholds of capitalism, a mighty legion, with lofty aspirations, clear and rational purposes, due intelligence and determination unconquerable; hand to hand we will enjoy the pleasure of the fraternal festival, and when the day closes it will find us vowing unflagging fellowship on all issues and occasions of common interest.

Senator C. I. Deyo, of Oxford, will deliver his celebrated lecture, "The Commonwealth of Industry." Mrs. Christina Bargheer, of Lather, the talented lady orator, will also address the people, subject: The true aim of the present reformers. Local speakers are also to be present. The day's festivities will close with a grand labor ball, at opera hall or the skating rink. Each delegation is invited to bring bands and American flags.

By order of the committee.

Nature cleanses the system if given an opportunity but very few persons find time to give nature a chance, and so the blood, which is the great drain for carrying away impurities, becomes so clogged with disease that unless some help is given it, the person will be afflicted by blood poisoning and suffer with pimples, boils, carbuncles, eczema, scrofula, etc, and often die without help. Save yourself from all this suffering and loss of time by using Parmelee's Blood purifier, which prevents all diseases in the blood. Large bottles $1. Sold by G. W. Crouter. sept

The Dyspeptic.—Dyspepsia indigestion, and biliousness seem to take the place of the three graces in many households. How sad is the condition of such a family. The kidneys and liver often get deranged, and perhaps the purest or even children, may be suffering from diabetes, bright's disease, or some kindred disease. As a preventive and also a cure for all the diseased conditions of the human family to preparation equals Parmelee's Vegetable Pills, for the kidneys and liver cure. Only $1 for large bottles. Sold by G. W. Crouter. sept

Health Will Follow the use of Brandreth's Hop Bitters and Hunter Bitters. They promote sleep and allay nervousness. They tone up and strengthen the system, without exciting the brain as do most other stimulants. They soothe to rest the jarring nerves, and calm the irritable and jaded system. They are prepared from the purest materials and are the best medicines you can use for restoring health and strength. Trial size, 50 cents; per bottle. Sold by G. W. Crouter. sept

An exhibition and auction sale of five oil paintings in rich gold frames, will be given in Stockman's building south of Sherwood's drug store, commencing Saturday, Sept. 3.

☞" The property, known as the Sweetland Sanitarium, on the south upper terrace in the village of Charlevoix, is for sale or rent.—Enquire of E. H. Green, Charlevoix, Michigan.

The Clara Belle towed the hull of the old Nellie Booth down here on Thursday. The engine will be removed and will be used in a barge that will be built here this winter.—Boyne Citizen.

The corps of teachers in the Charlevoix school will be the same as last year, with the exception of first primary, and assistant in the 5th department. Mrs. Oscar Upright, formerly for several years a teacher in our school, takes the place of Miss Waterbury, in the primary, and Miss Nettie C. Gray, the position in the 5th department.

We understand that some fields of corn near Charlevoix are ripe and are being cut this week, with the probable yield of ears above the average in quality and quantity. How, is this for Northern Michigan.

The fall term of school will begin Monday September 19th. Pupils designing to enter the 5th department, who were not present at the final examinations in June are requested to present themselves at the high school room at 9:00 o,clock on Friday September 16th.

Beginning Sept. 1st, the tri-weekly mail service, from Boyne to Eudine is extended to Charlevoix, thus giving Boyne and the postoffices on the north side of the lake direct service with Charlevoix. The schedule recommended, leaves Charlevoix on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, and returning arrives Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.

F. S. Blanchard is erecting a two story building on his lot just south of L. D. Bartholomew & Co's warehouse to be occupied, when completed by Perry Weed as a book and news stand in connection with soda fountain and confectionery. The second floor will be occupied by Charles Swallow as paint shop. Mr. Blanchard expects to have the building ready for occupancy Sept. 15.

Last Sunday morning, a few minutes after services commenced at the Ironton M. E. church, it was reported that the forest fires then raging near the town, were becoming unmanageable and threatened to overspread the town. The minister was at once delegated to investigate the matter and upon his report the services were adjourned and everybody took a hand in trying to control the flames, which was done during the day.

Prof. C. B. Cochran and wife, of West Chester, Pa., left Charlevoix for their home last Saturday. Prof. Cochran as a teacher of Chemistry in the state Normal school has dealt largely with the leading wholesale druggists of Philadelphia, for the past eight years. He took with him a large order from the firm of F. A. Cochran & Co. which he will fill while in Philadelphia, and the customers of that firm may be sure of obtaining pure drugs, and chemicals of the best quality.

The Anna Berger Concert company held good houses [illegible] Friday and Saturday evenings. Alvah Haywood, the humorist, was immense, and on each evening responded three times to encores. His recitations were perfect, and his particular fort seemed to be in impersonations of everything. While the company was first class, and each member highly cultivated, yet their selections on these occasions were too much in the order of rehearsals.

The Petoskey Democrat having challenged the Charlevoix Journal's assertions that certain persons had given wrong information to travelers bound for Charlevoix, with a view to deadling the Friant for Boyne, and told the bluff game by offering $5 for an instance, the Journal gets back by particularizing instances without directly mentioning names. It is not the Journal's fault if the parties involved, however, and we are curious to know what the Democrat is going to do about the rather awkward position it has got itself into.—Record.

We have made arrangements whereby we are enabled to furnish the JOURNAL and the Detroit Free Press, each four months, for 50 cents. The Journal, we aim to make the best local paper in the county, and the Free Press is generally conceded to be the best family newspaper in the state. It has lately been enlarged to ten pages, making it the largest weekly published in the northwest. One of the new and heroaftter complete and prominent features of the paper will be an agricultural department. Remember, both these papers four months for 50 cents.

Rev. A. O. Downs of Cadillac, has accepted the call to the pastorate extended by the Congregationalists of Charlevoix, and he will probably commence his work here about November 1st. A special from Cadillac to the Grand Rapids Democrat says of him: Rev. A. O. Downs, pastor of the Congregational church, closes his ministry here tomorrow. He will be greatly missed by our people, to all of whom he has endeared himself, regardless of sect. He has been engaged at Charlevoix, but before assuming his new charge, will spend a few weeks at his old home on Long Island, for which place he will leave Tuesday.

FIRST-CLASS BOARD.

Services at the M. E. church next Sunday morning and evening as usual. It is desired that everyone should be present, as this is the last sabbath of the conference year.

The Michigan conference of the M. E. church will be held at Bay View next week, commencing Wednesday, Sept. 7th. Bishop Harris, of New York, is expected to preach conference Sunday.

Rev. R. E. Jones, of Kalamazoo will hold Episcopal services, on Sunday next, at 10:30 a. m. in opera hall. Let all show, by their presence, due appreciation of his able and interesting ministrations.

☞Look at the date on the yellow address label on this paper, and see if you owe the printer. If you do, come and see us. If the slip does not show a credit the week following payment, please notify us at once, that the omission may be corrected.

House and Lot for Sale,—or will trade for horse and buggy, on terms to suit. Inquire of O. T. Wheary, Charlevoix, Mich.

Base Ball.

Cheboygan played with the Charlevoix team at Dixon park last Thursday and Friday. Thursday was the closest and most exciting game at Charlevoix this season. Up to the fourth inning no tallies were made on either side. During the third inning, Gage, Charlevoix's catcher, was struck with the ball on the knee with such serious effect that he was obliged to retire from the field, and Klock took his place behind the bat, where he did excellent work. At the close the score stood as follows:

Innings	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Cheboygan	0	0	0	1	0	1	0	0	2—3

The Friday's game also resulted in favor of Charlevoix by a score of 13 to 9. Hoskins and Klock were the battery for Charlevoix. Wheaton and Morrison pitched for Cheboygan, and were caught by Miller, Stone, and Garver. Klock and Johns of Charlevoix, and Garver of Cheboygan each made two-base hits. Miller and Morrison of Cheboygan each made three-base hits. An interesting feature of the game was the double play by Gish and Kraft.

Innings	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Charlevoix	1	4	1	1	0	0	3	0	3—13
Cheboygan	0	0	2	0	0	3	0	0	2—9

In Brief, and to the Point.

Dyspepsia is dreadful. Disordered liver is misery. Indigestion is a few to good matter.

The human digestive apparatus is one of the most complicated and wonderful things to exist. It is easily put out of order.

Greasy food, tough food, sloppy food, bad cooking, mental worry, late hours, irregular habits, and many other things which ought not to be, have made the American people a nation of dyspeptics.

But Green's August Flower has done a wonderful work in reforming this bad business and making the American people so healthy that they can enjoy their meals and digest them.

Remember—No happiness without health. But Green's August Flower brings health and happiness to the dyspeptic. Ask your druggist for a bottle. Seventy-five cents.

A Woman's Discovery.

"Another wonderful discovery has been made and that too by a lady of this county. Disease fastened its clutches upon her and for three years she withstood its severest tests, but her vital organs were undermined and death seemed imminent. For three months she coughed incessantly, and could not sleep. She bought of us a bottle of Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, and was so much relieved on taking first dose that she kept all night, and with one bottle has been miraculously cured. Her name is Mrs. Louisa Lake." This is the statement of Hurst & Co., of Shelby, N. C. Get a free trial bottle at Crouter's drug store.

The Verdict Unanimous.

W. D. Suit, druggist, Bigler, Ind., testifies: "I can recommend Electric Bitters, as the very best remedy. Every bottle sold has given relief in every case. One man took two bottles and was cured of rheumatism of 10 years standing." Abraham Hare, druggist, Delphos, Ohio, affirms: "The best selling medicine I have ever handled in my 20 years experience is Electric Bitters." Thousands of others have added their testimony so that the verdict is unanimous that Electric Bitters do cure all diseases of the Liver, Kidneys or Blood. Only a half a dollar a bottle at Dr. G. W. Crouter's drug store.

☞We are Anxious that every young lady should know that a delicate and harmless beautifier is to be found in Hamilton's Oriental Balm. It is unsurpassed when it is desired that the complexion so soft, and brilliant, so surely removes all tan and freckles, that no one needs only to give it a trial to be convinced of its merits. A LAMENT.

De frogs in de pon' is singin' every night
Wid dem lil' voices high an' frequently time,
An de sof' peepers to my, wid dat heart, soul, an' sight
Ev' night.
Yo tell us o' de comin' o' de June.

De gar wid er splash is er jumpin' fur de front
Dat's wallowed near de cypress tree, root
An' de bullfrog, old grim-ed wid his jaws so
Is er grabbin' o' de cropsy by de snoot.

De cole root turkis is er sayin' naughty stuff,
Ev' time he ketches de lil' baby sneezin',
An he's gittin' fur fur atay till he's dun got his fill
Ev' hole in de cornfield is dun sneezed.

Do cow's growin' fine, an' is ha'l leg high
In de fine wa'ter dey drink, fur dey
Don't looks as if all wo'ld's dun fallen nigh,
For it sounds mo' an' Tinky dan I kin.

Tildy was de wife o' my bosom an' my breast,
Mighty likely, sah, honest an' sound,
An' when she turned away from dis life fur her

THE KNAVE UNMASKED.

BY HENRY L. BLACK.

ONCE at the close of a bleak and dreary day in early October, at a street corner in the residence section of the city of Brooklyn, a young, vigorous and handsome man was supporting a gray-haired, rather feeble-looking old gentleman, who otherwise must have fallen to the ground.

Night was fast approaching, and a little wreath of pinted smoke above their heads was barely distinguishable in the twilight.

"Are you hurt, sir?" it was the younger one who spoke.

"I can say, I don't think so," answered his companion.

"Lean on my arm; you seem weak. The villain appears to be making good his escape." As the young man spoke he looked down the thoroughfare, where the flowing figure of a man was discernible, turning the corner of the next street.

"You have saved my life," murmured the old man, faintly; "but for your strong hand and close hand I would have fallen a victim of an assassin's bullet."

"I did smock up his arm at about the last moment to have swerved you. But what would have been the object of his murder—an assault?"

"Robbery, I make no doubt," replied the old gentleman, "for I'm quite certain that I've not an enemy in the world."

At this juncture one of those conservators of the peace, known as policemen, entered upon the scene, and inquired who had fired the shot.

"A large man, with a smooth face, and dressed in dark clothes and a stiff hat," answered the old gentleman. "I can't give any better description, because the sudden advent of his face, and would know him among a thousand. He attempted to take my life, and but for the timely interference of this brave young man, would doubtless have succeed. Report the matter at headquarters at once, and have the detectives set at work. You know where I live, don't you?"

"Very well, indeed, Mr. Hapgood," replied the officer, "and this gentleman."

"Can be found through me," interrupted the elder man. "You will accompany us home, my young friend?"

"Certainly, sir," answered the young man, "here, take my arm; you will walk better, so."

"I can never properly thank you for what you have done to-night," said Mr. Hapgood, as they walked slowly along.

"Don't mention it, sir, I beg of you."

"But I must mention it, you have saved my life, and at the risk, the imminent risk of your own—I expected to see the scoundrel shoot you. But you have not yet told me your name."

"My name, sir, is Clifford, John Clifford, and I am a clerk in the New York postoffice. I live in Brooklyn with my aged mother, and was on my way home when poverty for help attracted my attention, and I turned the corner just in time to arrest the murderer's hand."

"Mr. Clifford," said the old man earnestly, "I am pleased in you to find a young man struggling for advancement in the world. I have been through it all and know how to sympathize with you. But here we are at my residence, old-fashioned mansion, with broad steps and a deep porch. You must come in and dine with me. I, sah, do present you to my daughter Alice, my only child, that she may join me in thanking the man who has done me such a noble service."

"I thank you, Mr. Hapgood," said Clifford, bowing politely, "but I fear I must decline your hospitality this evening, and postpone the pleasure of meeting your daughter. The fact is that my mother is awaiting me. I am always punctual in arriving home, and I fear if she will be much worried if I am long delayed. It's very awkward, sir, and I am very sorry."

"No, sir," both the Mr. Hapgood, "it is not awkward. It is fit and proper. Filial affection is the noblest thing in our inferior natures. I have a daughter who loves me, and can appreciate your feelings. Go to your home and the supper your loving mother has prepared for you; you will no doubt enjoy it better than you would my fine dinner. But you must warn your mother not to expect you home early to-morrow, as you must dine and spend the evening with me. On now, as I would not for the world cause the worthy lady a moment's anxiety."

"Thank you, sir. I will call at this hour to-morrow, then evening," bowing and smiling the young man, Clifford hurried away.

A month later, a young man of about six-and-twenty, large and finely formed, with a handsome, intellectual face, Henry Winters by name, was seated in Mr. Hapgood's elegant parlor.

"Good morning, Harry," said the owner of the mansion, abruptly entering the apartment.

"Good morning, sir," said the young man, rising and advancing. "I have called to beg a moment's conversation with you in private."

"Certainly, Harry, come into the library," said Mr. Hapgood, entering that apartment, and motioning the young man to a seat near him.

"Mr. Hapgood," began Harry, "I have known you from boyhood, and for five years have been a constant visitor at your house. In these five years your daughter has grown from a winsome child to a beautiful and accomplished woman, and I have learned, sir—no hard task—to love her dearly. You know my family, my connections, and prospects in life. What I ask is to call Alice my wife—the head of your daughter in marriage."

Harry Winters bowed and sat down, while Mr. Hapgood sprang to his feet.

"What is this?" he said excitedly, almost enraged. "Marry my daughter—by his manner, he advanced to the young man's chair and gripped his hand. "You must pardon by abruptness, Harry, but I was taken by surprise. Have you gained my daughter's consent before seeking mine?"

"No, sir," answered Winters; "I could not in honor do that, but I must admit she knows my love for her, and that I have reasons to hope that it is not unrequited."

As Harry spoke the old man turned pale and sank back in his chair.

"This is unfortunate," he murmured, "most unfortunate. You are an honorable young man, Harry. I love you like a son, and you cannot, it grieves me sadly to say it, you cannot marry my daughter."

"And why not, Mr. Hapgood? Pray tell me why not?"

"Because she is promised to another."

"Another!" cried Harry, starting wildly, "she loves another! Impossible! I know she loves me!"

"I did not say that. I said she was promised."

"Might I ask to whom?" faltered Harry.

"To Mr. Clifford; you have more than once met him here during the last month. He is an excellent young man. He loves Alice, and she, I believe, has saved my life," answered Mr. Hapgood, softly.

"I understand," said young Winters, sadly. "But Alice—has she consented?"

"She will yield to my wishes, as the proper time; have no doubt about that. She knows no will but mine."

"Things you are asking for the best, sir. I know you think you are; but I feel that my daughter can never be happy with that man. Good evening, sir." And, bowing slightly, Harry Winters left the Hapgood mansion.

"Alice," said Mr. Hapgood, as his fair daughter, in obedience to his summons, entered the library, "I have something serious to say to you. I have received a visit from your lover."

"An offer for my hand! And how much you are offered! and who is the bidder, papa?" said Alice, blushing, but not with consciousness, for she had seen Harry leave the house not ten minutes before, and surmised his errand.

"The offer, my daughter, which I have accepted for you, comes from a worthy gentleman whom I respect and esteem and whom you cannot choose but love, Mr. John Clifford."

Alice Hapgood spoke no word, but turned deathly pale, bowed her head in her hands and sank into a chair.

"You, my young gentleman," pursued the father, not seeming to notice the daughter's emotion, "loved you at first sight, and has urged his suit upon several occasions. I have given my consent, and he will speak to you on the subject to-morrow."

"But, father, I can never love Mr. Clifford. I feel grateful to him as the preserver of my dear father's life. He is handsome, educated, brilliant, but I distrust him, and so for loving him—"

Here Hapgood shuddered in a manner that emphasized the sentence more forcibly than he would have done in words.

"My daughter, you do John an injustice; you do, indeed. He is an honest, industrious, and in all respects an exemplary young man, and as a son-in-law he will be entirely satisfactory to me."

"But as a husband he will not be so entirely satisfactory to me." And fair Alice burst into a flood of tears.

"But, Alice, I've promised you to Mr. Clifford; you would not have me break my word?"

"My father, but you have wealth, great wealth; offer him money——"

"Would you have me insult the man to whom I owe my life, daughter?" And Mr. Hapgood frowned severely. "I did offer to loan him ten thousand dollars with which to engage in some business, but he declined it promptly, saying that he could not accept a reward for simply doing his duty, that was before he asked your hand."

"And now he claims a reward in a different form. He doubtless does not know that I am to be your heiress."

"Daughter, your sarcasm jails to please me. But tell me," and the old gentleman, suddenly, "have you any other attachment that makes Mr. Clifford so distasteful to you?"

Alice turned red, then white, and finally burst into tears.

"Don't ask me, father," she exclaimed "I certainly am not attached to Mr. Clifford. Grant me this one favor. Let nothing be said to me on this subject by this person for one month, until the fifteenth of January, and on that day, if you still desire it, I will plight my troth to Mr. Clifford."

"Alice, I have received an offer for your hand."

"Did I may tell him this? He will be all smiling."

"Yes, father, if you choose; but in the meantime, you must do your best to change your mind."

That night Alice wrote Harry Winters a letter, in which she told him that she desired particularly to know something of John Clifford, his character and his record.

"Find out all about him Harry," said she in conclusion, "and report to me on the fifteenth of January, when I will explain all to you. In the meantime don't call on me."

It was the morning of the fifteenth of January.

Within the spacious library of the Hapgood mansion its master and his fair daughter were seated, awaiting the arrival of her suitor, Mr. John Clifford. They had been silent for some time, when Alice spoke:

"About this disagreeable business, father, do you still wish me to marry Mr. Clifford?"

"I certainly do. The more I see of him the better I like him, and the more worthy I consider him of my daughter. I will admit that somehow I would prefer Harry Winters, but then you know, John saved my life from a cowardly assassin. I can't forget that."

At that moment a servant entered and announced Harry Winters.

"Show him in," said Mr. Hapgood, "the son of my old friend will never be denied admission here."

A moment later Harry himself entered and was kindly received by the father and daughter, the latter giving him a look which plainly said, "How have you succeeded?"

"Mr. Hapgood," began Harry, "I have news for you; a man has been arrested charged with firing at you some two months ago, and the officers have brought him here to see if you can identify him."

"Very well, let them come in," said Mr. Hapgood.

Harry left the room as the old gentleman spoke, and returned immediately, followed by two detectives with a smooth faced, villainous-looking young man between them.

"That is the man. I could swear to him any place," cried the old gentleman. "How did you succeed in finding him?"

"Mr. Winters is entitled to the credit," replied one of the officers. "He found a photograph, from which we identified the prisoner."

"But he had never seen him. How could he know him from a photograph?"

"The man, George Holmes," said Harry, indicating the prisoner, "had been photographed at Sing Sing with his chum and partner in crime, James Costello. I found their picture in the rogues' gallery, number 1921. Here it is." And he produced and handed Mr. Hapgood a card photograph.

"Great heaven!" cried the old gentleman, "what have we here?"

His daughter leaned to his side, and seized the card from his trembling hand. It was a picture of Harry Winters in the regalia of the penitentiary; one, the prisoner before her the other, the man she had known as John Clifford.

"I always suspected it," she murmured, giving Harry a grateful look.

"And what have you to say?" said Mr. Hapgood sternly to the ex-convict.

"I don't know," he growled.

"Do you deny this charge?"

"I'd better tell, for I'm will if I don't. He always saves himself. I fired the shot, sir, at the door you mentioned. I had a scheme to give Jim a chance to rescue you. I urged him to take the ten thousand you offered, but he struck for a high stake and we've lost everything."

As he finished speaking a step was heard in the hall, and the next instant the door was thrown open, and John Clifford entered the library.

"Good morning, Mr. Costello," said Harry Winters, turning to your old friend, Mr. Holmes."

"Confusion!" cried Clifford, "what does this mean?"

"It means," cried the old gentleman, "that you are unmasked, you scoundrel—and you thought to marry my daughter! Officers, take him away."

Clifford made no reply, but sprang suddenly through the window and disappeared.

"After him," shouted Mr. Hapgood.

"Never mind," said one of the detectives, quietly, "he'll have officers at the street door. He's wanted on half a score of charges, and will go down for a long term. Good morning." And the officers vanished with their prisoner.

"And now, Harry," said Mr. Hapgood, "forgive an old man who has been grievously deceived. Take my daughter, and be happy."

"Well, father," said Alice, slyly, "if he is your choice for a son-in-law, I'll not refuse him as a husband."

The Reveries of a Bachelor.

"She would like to see me," he said to himself, surveying the apartment, with its low look-cases, its precious bits of sculpture and bits from the antiquity of abroad, its prostrate gorgeousness of Turkish rugs, its tapestries, its tasteful and luxurious air of faultless bien etre. At the same time he noticed the exquisite arrangement of other rooms, visited perhaps but once a fortnight or oftener, but evidently always kept in the most irreproachable order by a body of trained servants. His entire establishment was an ornate monumental tribute to his own selfishness.

He lit a cigar. He never smoked more than a dozen cigars during the twenty-four hours; one after dining and one a little before bed time.

He sank into the big cushioned chair and pulled forth the first blue cloud from a Cuban tobacco imported for him by his family repeated, half aloud, the reflection which had before been a silent one:

"She would like all this."

He assented that he should not only like it, but marry to get it. He had had by as many dame as Henry Ward Van Henselaer yet. Indeed, the longer that he sat musing and smoking there in his library, the more he convinced he felt that now the ice had been once fairly broken, the true line of action had begun.—Edgar Fawcett.

Happy Thought.

"It is too bad," said the managing editor to the funny man: "here is a man in the counting-room desiring to put in a big advertisement, and the editor in chief and the publisher are both at the beach."

"Well, can't you manage that yourself?"

"Well, not very well. Somebody is wanted to swear to the circulation."

"Oh, I see."

"Unfortunate, isn't it?"

"I should say so. What's to be done?"

"Can't you swear to it?"

"Why, man, they won't accept me."

"Misery! Will I do?"

"You! Absurd."

"Too bad! Oh, by the way, is the religious editor here?"

"Religious editor—yes, yes! Why didn't I think of it before? He will be accepted without a murmur.

"The thing is done at once.—Boston Courier.

His Profession.

A baby girl of three years, who had strayed away from home, was found by a policeman. The child's father was a leading lawyer in the place where he lived.

"What's your name, little one?" inquired Mons'eur Bluecoat.

"Mamie," was the reply.

"Mamie what?"

"No, not Mamie what, dee Mamie."

"What's your father's business?"

The little girl reflected, and replied, "He tuts meat."

The policeman imagined the father to be a butcher, but subsequently found that Mamie's conception of her father's business was based upon his proficiency in carving roast meat at the dinner-table.—Youth's Companion.

Late Tantalizations.

DJUSTABLE vests of woolen material, including plaited and starched muslins, are useful for wear with any basque which has the open front. These vests crimp a basque sufficiently without any further appliance.

To go with these chemisettes there are the daintiest little neckties. The prettiest are those shown in the cut—They are made of sheer white lawn. The ends are a little full, finished hemstitched, and the narrowest of hems. A little fine embroidery just above. All so dainty, yet so perfect as to bear examination under a microscope.

Since the season by the seaside is now fairly opened, bathing costumes count among the more interesting garments for the time. It must be said that they do not, for the most part, differ very greatly from those worn last season. They are made with broad, square collars, lying flat upon the shoulders, or else with close, almost tight-fitting, round collars, the upper or waist portion, and the knickerbockers, (which reach only to the knees), are in one piece in the best models, and the skirt is added by a row of buttons placed around the waist. The material is flannel, usually dark-blue, braid. Black or navy-blue stockings, with the usual flat-soled sandals, clothe the feet and limbs, while a broad-brimmed, grotesquely formed straw hat protects the face from the attacks of sun, freckles having few admirers.

Artistic needlework is again very fashionable, and has been practiced by many young ladies, who now revert to the work of their grandmothers in this as in some other things. Lambrequins are not now thought so much of as in the popular days of macrame-work. Macrame was simple, and at the same time very ornamental, and a very handsome lambrequin, either for mantelpiece or window, could be produced by any girl who chose to give a little time to it, without putting much taste to the work. The present prevailing style of lambrequin is, however, a very different article in fact as it is velvet, and the very highest art of the needlewoman is often employed in the production of sprays for its decoration.

Aprons, pin-cushions, card-cases, wall-pockets, and many similar articles receive their due share of embroidery, and are made of beautifully beautiful as the taste of the maker dictates. One of the prettiest objects for the display of fine needle work is a racket-cover. Tennis accessories are becoming every year more exquisite, and the covers in which the rackets are kept are now among the most elaborate of them. Flannel velvet, plush, etc., may be used as material for one of these covers, and a spray of flowers on one side and the initials of the owner upon the other are embroidered in floss silk, in artistic and symmetrical signs.

As the season progresses, the style of millinery seem to become simpler. A straw hat or bonnet nowadays only has a band of ribbon and a spray of flowers to be, according to the prevailing modes, completely trimmed, and even the garniture is thrown on in the most careless way. Dainties are among the best loved flowers for bonnets, and sprigs of golden-rod, blue-bells, forget-me-nots, buttercups, and others of the simpler varieties of flowers are also much used. The ribbons are invariably of the finest, softest, most flexible edges are invariable.

A very modest dress covered with fine India muslin was the foundation of a very charming evening dress recently worn by a very young lady. The draperies were also of muslin, and were lovely, bunched upon the hips with a very fine satin ribbon. The bodice was V shaped at the top, and short puffed sleeves of the material, the only protection for the arms. The entire dress was of pure white, relieved by a loose pale-blue sash at the waist and occasional knots of ribbon of the same tint and fine pale-blue silk hose.

Light, cool, and graceful dresses for girls of thirteen or fourteen are made of gingham and worn with embroidered guimpes. Hamburg embroidery is also employed in trimming them. They are made with full, tucked skirts and shirred fronts, reminding one very forcibly of girls' dresses twenty years ago or so.

Redingotes, made very long and very plain, of woolen material, are not occasionally seen. They are usually trimmed with velvet, in the shape of revers, cuffs and collars, and fasten from one shoulder down with a row of large ornamental buttons, in this way concealing all but a very small V-shaped portion of the skirt. They are dropped at the back in a similar manner to an ordinary skirt, and passementerie is sometimes added to their adornment. Redingotes are not wholly neglected this season.

Thoughts About Bustles.

You are entirely mistaken if you have been imagining that with the departure of three never-ending sources for stale wit, the high hats at the theater, men will have nothing to grow about respecting women's dress.

Oh, my, no. They are not going to give up their little game in that senile style, you may rest assured. Rather would they be awake nights originating a new manoeuver for them. They know wonderful well would offer up in smoke endless cigars as sacrifice to cogitating ponderings in a new onslaught. They would expend their last dollar in the effort, if necessary, to get it were necessary.

Women only need no such extravagant bribe. On the contrary, they simply fall back upon an old and, we had almost said, sacred custom. They are discussing the uses and abuses of the bustle.

His dignified sponsor in the satirical remarks—at least one of them smattered of feel, if not dig, Lady when he said he ingenuously accoutered woman suggested a symbol of modesty of the sex—meant to Parter sarcasm, with all the plumage borne where the ostrich carries the horse it is fond, or something like that, he said.

Again, he yet asserted, it was a very well-conceived piece of ingenuity, and ingenuity is a very great thing

HANDSOME FOWLS POSSESSING MERIT AS EGG PRODUCERS.

Weaning Pigs, with Directions for Feeding so as to Make Bone, Muscle and Fat—Protection from Rice Stings—A Dipping Box for Sheep.

The accompanying illustration shows a dipping box and has been satisfactorily used in dipping sheep. Country Gentleman tells how to make it: It is composed of two inch pine plank, and is held together by bolts across the ends, outside the box. The joints are put together with white lead. One end of the box is inclined, so that the sheep may be readily drawn upon the draining table, which has slats upon the top, so as to permit the fluid that drains from the wool to run back into the tub. This table is fastened to the box by hooks at each side. One end rests upon the box, and the other is supported by legs.

A DIPPING BOX.

This box is half filled with the dipping fluid, which may be used cold, but it is preferable when about 80 degs. temperature. Two men turn a sheep upon its back, lift up its legs and head and submerge its body in the fluid, keeping nostrils and eyes clear, if possible. No harm results, however, if all goes under. A third man should stand upon the opposite side of the box to assist in keeping the sheep under for a minute or so while the wool is being soaked to the skin. The animal is then drawn upon the draining table, and the wool pressed by the hand to force out as much fluid as can readily be done. The sheep is then lifted to the ground or floor. In the meantime one of the two men first named has another sheep ready for its turn. It takes about three minutes to each animal. Where the flock is large the box should be twelve or fifteen feet long, and high enough, so that the sheep are made to swim its length. They can thus be passed through very rapidly, being retained upon the draining table as long as may be necessary.

The commercial dips are usually trustworthy, but where these cannot be obtained a good preparation is made by mixing one part crude carbolic acid with 250 parts of water. It may be further weakened for lambs.

The time to dip sheep is whenever they are troubled with ticks, lice, maggots (for which the dip must be strong) or the scab.

Weaning Pigs.

Weaning pigs is a subject of discussion among professional pork growers. The farmer who takes to swen must remember that his high profit lies in his ability to so run them little pork making machines as to keep their digestion in perfect order, and to daily increase the capacity of the stomach for digestion and assimilating the largest possible amount of food.

The stomach will keep in better condition if the times of feeding be not too far apart and the quantity given only sufficient to satisfy hunger, yet not to surfeit. Here is a fine point in getting best growth and keeping the pigs in highest condition of health. They should be fed at least five times a day until five or six months old, and if from two to four months the same amount of feed for the day be divided into five meals there will be less danger of over feeding or deranging the digestion.

The pig is omnivorous, and its highest and most rapid development, says American Cultivator, from which the above is quoted, calls for a generous variety of food. During the period of growth there should be a smaller per cent. of carbonaceous or fat formers supplied, while the per cent of phosphorus and nitrogenous compounds should be increased. Corn contains six of the carbonates to one of phosphates. Since the object of feeding pigs between the ages of two and seven months is to develop growth of frame and powers of assimilation, it is evident that bone and tissue cannot be made out of fattening food. Something cannot be made out of nothing, but a sappy pig can some as near to making it as any animal created.

Then if our object is not to make fat, but bone and muscle, we must feed for these. Where pigs have access to grass and artichokes or potatoes, or acorns and beech nuts, and the endless variety they find under and above ground, they may do well where they have, in addition to these, enough corn to keep them in medium flesh, and so save them from overwork in hunting a living.

Indian corn is especially rich in fat formers. Oats, on the other hand, are especially rich in phosphates or bone and muscle formers. Clover and grass so happily combine the two that when stock are high have run on clover and grass they make a good growth of bone and muscle, and a development of stomach which enables them to assimilate a greater amount of corn when the time comes to fatten them.

If by the starving process only enough corn is given to keep the pig alive and squealing vigorously, he may have lived healthfully, but how about the stomach, development, but how about and profit in the pig? The powers of the stomach are not developed by feeding concentrated food in small quantities. If there is but little corn to be fed, it will pay to have it ground and feed even on clover hay, enough to secure the bulk needed to enlarge the stomach. When the starved pig arrives at the time he is to be fed all he will eat, he will not have the capacity and power of stomach to eat and digest his bushel of corn in five days, and convert the same into fifteen pounds of pork. Good pigs have done this and 50 per cent. more during the fattening season.

Whitewashing Trees.

Prof. Riley, the well-known entomologist, does not approve of whitewashing trees. He says: "In reality not only are the four troublesome insects that infest shade trees no in any way be affected by the wash and that is the tussock moth. So far as the whitewashing reaches a certain number of the cocoons will be loosened and exposed to the rains or robbed off by the washing, and it may be possible that the lime will affect them, though there is no evidence that such is the case. But it is of no earthly use against the bag worm or the elm leaf beetle or the web worm."

As to tree boxes Prof. Riley says: "While these may be necessary on account of the injury that without them horses and other animals, as well as mischievous boys, would inflict upon the trees, at least until these have attained a certain size, they are always harmful. They injure the trees by chafing and by the pressure of the bandages, and when of wood, as they are in the city of Washington, they are particularly injurious, because they serve as still far different insects. If the laws cannot be made so strict as to prevent injury from horses or lads then I would advise the use of round iron boxes."

Information About Carp.

Carp can be kept to almost any kind of food. It feeds principally on vegetable food, such as grains, bread, roots, or almost any vegetable matter whatever that may be given it. It does not devour its own young, and for this reason increases rapidly, but the presence of other fish that have this propensity would be highly objectionable in the same pond. The carp soon becomes quite tame, and a limited number may be kept in a large wire box when partly grown, but this could hardly be made profitable. They have heretofore been supplied from Washington, and in inquiries addressed to the United States fish commissioner the applicant should give, in addition to his own name and postoffice address, the name of the railroad and railroad station nearest his residence, the dimensions of his pond and its general character, and especially what kinds of fish, if any, the pond contains.

A Cellar in Springy Ground.

In dealing with a cellar in springy ground, the first thing to be done is to provide some chance for the water to run away before getting into the cellar. This may be done by laying a two inch tile drain pipe in a trench dug all around the foundation outside of the walls, and from one foot to two feet below the cellar floor. Put this pipe together with mortar and cover it with cobblestones to keep out the dirt and sand. If it is not practicable to lay the drain outside, it may be laid inside of the cellar walls, directly in the cellar floor; but the operation of such a drain is less efficient. The back filling of the cellar walls should be porous enough to allow the water to go directly into the drain.—Sanitary Engineer.

Another Method for Keeping Eggs.

For preserving eggs use one peck of lime, three pails of boiling water; stir it up well and let it stand for twenty-four hours; now strain off the lime water. If any egg sinks it is ready; if any egg floats too strong. Now pour this lime water into a deep earthenware pot; gently in put your eggs; fresh laid, no cracks. Take a cup and gently pour on this lime water until the eggs are quite covered. Tie paper over. Be sure and stand your pot or pots where they are not likely to be moved, and where they will be free from frost. Prior to using eggs thus preserved wash each egg in cold water. If to boil for eating, prick a tiny hole at the top; this prevents cracking.—Poultry World.

CARE OF THE STOMACH.

An Old New Yorker Gives Some Advice in Regard to its Treatment.

An old New Yorker, who was brought up in hotels and restaurants, and knows all about eating, gave some points to a reporter the other day about the way for a man to make friends with his stomach. "There are two big mistakes that almost all persons make," said he, "one is that they don't eat the right things, and the other is that what they do eat they don't eat right. Dyspepsia and indigestion are killing more people—ban rum ten times over. Why delirium tremens is joy compared with a bad digestion. When a man has the tremens he's happy sometimes, because he forgets himself, but when he's got dyspepsia his stomach is always with him, and he's always conscious of it. He can't sleep. His food doesn't taste right. Boils break out over him. He's morbid. All his friends seem to have developed lies and some day he goes off and blows his brains out, and the public and newspapers say he had business troubles. Business troubles! Why, what does he care for business troubles when his stomach's all right? If his stomach is right his head will be clear, and he'll prosper. No glutton or dyspeptic can stand up alongside of a man with a sound stomach and a clear head.

"When you got up this morning what did you do? Went right to bed and rolled and filled yourself, with your nose in the papers as you stuffed sausages into the earth. You don't know what you ate, or how much or how long it took. For all the good it did you, you might as well have swallowed bacon and corn bread, or turkey and hasheed and cakes, or any other mixture that would take up space in your stomach. Then, while you ate, you piled the food into your mouth, fire alternately, and when you got through you lit a cigar and went down town, and you had done part of the work of the day.

"That's not breakfasting. It's loading up your stomach, and it's worse for you than if you hadn't eaten anything. Then you have a headache and feel bad, and grow fat, and wonder why it all is. It's because you don't pay as much attention to your stomach as you do to your office boy. Your stomach takes its revenge by making you wretched. To quench it you pour a lot of liquor into it and gulp some ice water on that, with a cracker or pretzel and a bit of cheese. What sort of a mixture do you call that? Just imagine the cheese and rum and pretzel, and think that something inside of you has got to get away with that. If you want to drink, drink and enjoy your drink. Don't drown it and fling things at it when you've got it down. Take a glass of wine and enjoy it, but don't fling it into your stomach as you would your jim into somebody's eye. Your stomach ought to be your friend, but if you go to pitching into it it'll show fight, and you may be understand that it'll get the best of it.

"When you get up in the morning take a big drink of water. Your system wants water first. An engine isn't first fired up and then water let into the boiler. Clean your teeth, and let the water run from the spigot while you're doing it. Then drink a pint of it. Use common hydrant water; no ice, no salt, no mineral water. Ordinary water is good enough for an ordinarily healthy man. Keep away from drugs and pills and give your stomach a rest.

"If you're in a hurry to read the papers, read them before breakfast. When you sit down to the breakfast table be happy; you're going to do something pleasant. Breakfast isn't a penalty imposed on you or a task to be performed as soon as possible, but a pleasant, enjoyable occasion. Try and have somebody talk to you, and talk yourself. Laugh. Start off with fruit—some oranges, say. Then eat some fish and stale bread, or stale rolls or toast. If you want anything more, eat some meat. Take your time to it all. I stay at the table for an hour, and eat all the time. Don't eat much, but take your time to it. If you haven't time at lunch, the time you spend at breakfast will be saved over and over again during the day.

"If you've been up the night before don't take a cocktail or ice water. Try some lovin and some tripe if your stomach's pretty far gone. When a man's been off a little like that he's very proud and inflamed. He doesn't want to start right off with more poison to inflame his stomach a show. I'll pay him to. Coddle your stomach in the morning and it'll do all right for you. Treat it like you go pitching into it first thing it will have its revenge.

"Don't smoke in the morning. Don't drink in the morning. If you must smoke and you must drink, wait until your stomach is through with breakfast. Try this plan of starving off the hair square. You can drink more and smoke more in the evening, and it won't tell on it. A man's stomach is his friend, and if he'll only treat it kindly the first half of the day it will return the favor and and stick by him at night."—New York Sun.

Crops in Mexico.

Between San Juan del Rio and Queretaro the Mexican Central traverses the fields of one Mexican farmer who raises 20,000 bushels of wheat a year. There are six or seven haciendas in the same locality where the crops reach 10,000 bushels; and 10,000 bushels of wheat means 40,000 bushels of corn, 20,000 bushels of peas, and 6,000 bushels of beans on the same hacienda. That is the way the Mexican farmer of this part of the country diversifies his crops. He raises wheat, corn, beans, and peas in about the proportion given. Occasionally there is a hacienda in the Queretaro district owned by one who goes into the raising of chile, the hot peppers of this country. This man usually has 60,000 chile plants or vines.—Globe-Democrat.

Effects of Mental Starvation.

A large part of the failures, the disappointments, the inferior work, the unthinking, the shallow reasoning, the lack of kindly feeling and sympathy, and other which afflict mankind, is due to the lack of nourishment afforded to the faculties. They are starved, consequently feeble and inefficient. Men plead the lack of time to enrich their minds, to stimulate their powers, to feed their moral natures. As well might the bird with dropping wing and declining strength plead that he had so many flights to take in midair that he had no time to pick the corn from the field or the fruit from the tree to sustain him in those flights.—Home Journal.

SILVER SPANGLED LAYERS.

This family includes the Golden Penciled, golden spangled, silver penciled and silver penciled varieties, the last named being represented in the cut. The silver spangled fowls, though small, are peculiarly graceful and sprightly. They represent a favorite breed with those poultry keepers who take pleasure in the beauty as well as the utility of their fowls. None of the Hamburgs show much disposition to sit, and they are in a state of great freedom, and for one day through the year, except in the moulting season.

Security from Bee Stings.

While interest in one's work in the apiary is a great security from bee stings, there are many persons who will require further protection, especially when handling hybrids. For those who must protect their hands there is nothing better than long rubber gloves. An oversleeve of cotton cloth, with an elastic to each end, to hold it snugly in place at wrist and elbow, will prevent ramming bees from making explorations inside of one's sleeve.

To guard the face, a veil of muquiite netting, covered by hay, should be sometimes indispensable. A piece one and one-fourth by three-fourths yard should be sewed together, with an elastic cord in one end, to be adjusted over the hat crown. Four or five inches from the top insert a piece of fine wire cloth or stout, stiff bobinet lace, six by nine inches. At a suitable distance from the bottom attach a narrow tape, to tie about the neck, as shown in the cut.

A number of veils should always be in readiness, not only for the use of the operator and assistants, but for the convenience of visitors who may desire to witness the operations.

Women, who are becoming more and more interested in practical bee keeping, ought to wear an appropriate dress for the work. The dress should have a skirt short enough to escape being dragged in wet grass. Drawers should be made close about the ankles, and sleeves close at the wrists. Such a dress, with veil and gloves, affords women ample protection from stings.

Windmills for pumping water and furnishing power for farm machinery are reported to be in increasing demand.

BEYOND THE LAW.

The Scope of the Pacific Inquiry Defined by Justice Field—Leland Stanford Not Obliged to Answer the Questions Propounded.

JUSTICE FIELD, of the United States Supreme Court, rendered a decision, at San Francisco, declining to make an order compelling Senator Stanford and others to answer questions propounded by the Pacific Railroad Commissioners, and also refused to give the commission access to the books of certain construction companies. Following is a summary of Judge Field's decision:

The Pacific Railway Commission, created under act of Congress of March 3, 1887, is not a court, but is a tribunal for judicial power. It can determine to whom, if any, the property or the companies whose affairs it investigates. These rights will remain the subject of judicial inquiry and determination as fully as though the commission had never been created, and in such inquiry its report to the President will have no force. It can only be used as evidence of any of the matters investigated. It is a mere board of inquiry, directed to obtain information upon certain matters, and report the result of its investigations to the President, who is to lay the same before Congress with the progress of its investigations, and in furtherance of them it is authorized to invoke the aid of the courts of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents. It is not to be doubted that the circuit or District Court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which continuancy or refusal of any person to obey subpœna to him may issue an order requiring such person to appear before the tribunal, among and not other things, books and papers, and give evidence touching the matter in question. Of all rights of the citizen few are of greater importance or more essential to his peace and happiness than the right of personal security, and that involves not merely the protection of his person from assault, but the protection of his private affairs, books, and papers from inspection and scrutiny of others. Without the enjoyment of this right all other rights would lose half their value. The law provides for compulsory production in the process of civil and criminal proceedings or by direct writ for that purpose issued upon the application of the party of others, and also in certain cases for the seizure of eliminating papers necessary for the prosecution of offenses against public justice, and only in one of these ways can they be obtained against the owner against the exercise of the will of the owners. In the recent case of Boyd vs United States (116 U. S. 616) the Supreme Court held that the provision of a law of Congress which authorized the Court of the United States in revenue cases on motion of the Government authority to require defendant or claimant to produce his private books, papers, invoices, and papers, or that the allegations of the attorney respecting them should be taken as confessed, was unconstitutional and void as applied to suits for penalties or to establish forfeitures of property goods. In Kilbourn vs. Thompson (103 U. S. 168) we have the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that neither house of Congress had the power to make inquiries into the private affairs of a citizen.

THE race for the championship of the leagues is between decidedly unequal horses, as will be seen by the appended record of the eight contesting clubs:

Clubs.	Won.	Lost.	Percentages.
Boston	47	20	.701
Chicago	45	22	.672
New York	43	41	.563
Philadelphia	43	41	.563
Boston	41	41	.500
Washington	35	47	.427
Pittsburg	34	48	.415
Indianapolis	25	55	.313
St. Louis	22	59	.272

St. Louis still maintains a long lead in the American Association pennant race. The following shows the record of won and lost games:

The Ute Troubles.

A DENVER telegram says the fatalities in the recent battle between Colorow's Utes and the whites were five whites and nine Indians, three of the former and five of the latter were wounded. Six hundred Indians are camped within six miles of Glenwood Springs, and are in an ugly mood. The official report of Lieutenant Burnett, U. S. A., is to the effect that Colorow had was attacked by the whites after being assured that they would be allowed to return to the reservation unmolested.

More Land for Settlers.

MR. SPERCHLAKER, acting Land Commissioner, says a Washington telegram, has taken the necessary steps to carry into effect Secretary Lamar's recent order directing the restoration to settlement and entry of the unapproved indemnity selections of the California and Oregon Railroad Company in California. The road runs from Roseville, near Sacramento, to the California and Oregon line, a distance of 209 miles, and the order of restoration, it is said, will affect about 750,000 acres.

Professor Baird's Successor.

WASHINGTON telegram: "The President caused universal surprise to-day in the selection of Solicitor McCrea, of the Treasury Department, to succeed Professor Baird as Fish Commissioner. Judge McCrea is absent in Maine, and the announcement of his appointment was doubtless a greater surprise to him than to others."

Cold Comfort for Ferdinand.

PARIS French papers has received telegrams from the Sultan and Czar, neither of which is at all reassuring. The Sultan tells the young man that he assumption of the throne was illegal, and that he has violated the Berlin treaty. The Czar declares that he can not approve his action, and the letter is very arbitrary in its terms.

THE EASTERN STATES.

A FRIGHTFUL collision, with loss of life, occurred on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad at Glen Easton Siding, a point twenty-four miles east of Wheeling. A west-bound emigrant train was descending a heavy grade, when it crashed into an east-bound freight train with fearful velocity, wrecking both engines and badly smashing up a large number of cars. The passengers of the train consisted of Norwegians, Finns, Poles, Germans, Dutch, and a few English. Most of them kept their heads and as soon as the first paroxysm of terror had subsided lent their efforts to disengaging their fellow passengers from the debris and attending to their injuries. At Smith and Jesse Abraham, engineer and fireman of the emigrant train, were found to be the only two persons killed outright. About twenty emigrants were wounded, several of them beyond the hope of recovery.

JOHN CROSS & FULL, a Wall street firm, have made an assignment. One estimate of the liabilities classes them at $1,500,000, while friends of the firm state that $800,000 in cash would settle everything. The nominal assets are $2,000,000.

A DISPATCH from Gardner, Ill., says: "Miss Sarah H. Dodge, the alleged slayer of Walter S. Babcock, the Chicago lumber merchant, waived a hearing, and was admitted to bail in the sum of $10,000. The willingness of State's Attorney Carter to accept $10,000 bail is construed as a tacit admission that he does not believe Miss Dodge will be convicted of the murder by the court, and that the case will never get further than the Grand Jury. Mr. Carter admitted as much. He said: It will be difficult to convict Miss Dodge, I fear. Babcock's friends will not prosecute her, but want to let the matter sleep. He refused to make any statement against her. She can claim the shooting was in self-defense or accidental, and there is no way of successfully contradicting her." The true status of the death of Babcock will never be known to the public unless Miss Dodge chooses to reveal it. There is no reason why she should, and every reason why she should not."

THE WESTERN STATES.

A DISPATCH from Denver of Friday last says: "Tuesday Major Leslie left Meeker with twenty men, going toward Blue Mountain, northeast from Meeker, to intercept the Utes, and a prominent scouting rancher reached Glenwood with the information that Leslie had found them in Pot-Hole Basin, on White River, in a natural stronghold. They number about two hundred bucks. Major Leslie had a parley with them, but they demanded the 'big white man' to come to the reservation, and, to quote, 'and send: 'Wou't talk to cowboys; white want little fight; soldiers must go back or have little fight.' General Scanlon at once telegraphed Governor Adams urging him to accede to this request, and the Governor left for Meeker and the front."

A TELEGRAM from San Antonio, Texas, reports the death of Jesus Valdivaski, "a wealthy merchant of Vera Cruz," at the age of 154, and the appearance at his funeral, in the capacity of pall-bearers, of three sons, the youngest 100 years old. All mail for Mr. Joseph Mulhaton should be sent to San Antonio until further notice.

THE Governors of Kansas, Colorado, Ohio, Wisconsin, and Minnesota have revoked their quarantine proclamations against Illinois cattle, on account of the prompt action of Iowa and Wyoming proclamations have also been modified.

An unusual scene occurred at the burial of Samuel Sparks at Crown Hill Cemetery, says an Indianapolis telegram. Sparks committed suicide by taking morphine, but a desire to keep the fact out of the papers led his family to keep his death a secret. The undertaker called at the health office for a permit to bury the remains. When the death certificate was handed to the officer in charge he refused to issue the permit, saying that the case should be called to the attention of the Coroner. The latter was summoned by telephone, but before he could take charge of the case the corpse was on route to Crown Hill as rapidly as decency would permit it to be carried. The Coroner secured a large and selected jury to examine the funeral procession, and reached the cemetery just as the corpse was about to be lowered into the grave. He stopped the ceremonies, and the body taken from the coffin, pulled back the top-lids, and took measurements of the corpse, all being done in the presence of the family and friends. The funeral ceremonies were then allowed to proceed.

AN attempt was made at South Bend, Ind., to remove from the street the poles and wires of the Central Union Telephone Company. After the connection with the Exchange had been severed an injunction restraining the prosecution of the work was served on the authorities. The company attempted to regale the dismantled poles, but the citizens took the matter in hand and chopped them down as fast as they were created.

FARRAGUT POST, G. A. R., says an Evansville (Ind.) despatch, is making great preparations for the reunion of the blue and the gray in that city from Sept. 20 to 25, inclusive. A number of prominent Generals of both sides have accepted invitations. Among those whose engagements prevent them from coming is ex-Senator Roscoe Conkling, of New York, from whom the post has received the following letter:

NEW YORK, Aug. 22.—GENTLEMEN: It is an honor highly valued to be invited as one of the guests of Farragut Post of the G. A. R. at the reunion of veterans of the Republic. I shall be delighted to meet my old comrades in the late fight on one side and old friends on the other, and to see Indiana and Evansville. My thanks and I believe my regret sincere at being unable to take part in observances of so much interest and significance. My earnest sympathy and hope go to and go with every movement and every thought that may contribute to the better of all sections and all classes, and to make our country throughout all its borders united prosperous, and great. Could wish or act of mine decide every community and magnificent Hoosier like land should be crowned with—Republican. Congratulations and good wishes to the South as at the East, the West, or the North. The brave men who faced each other in battle can be the best teachers and the most sensible advisers of this creed. Glad that the reunion is to occur, and never forgetful of the honor done me by comrades of Farragut. Long live the soldiers and the people of Indiana. I trust the occasion will be an event of enjoyment, pride, and success. Cordially your old friend, ROSCOE CONKLING.

THE Coroner's jury in the Babcock case, in Gardner, Ill., returned a verdict reciting that, from the testimony, they believed the fatal shot to have been fired by Sarah Dodge, and recommending a full investigation by the Grundy County grand jury. No new facts were brought out at the inquest.

A DENVER dispatch states the report that Leadville and its vicinity had been surrounded by whites "It now appears that they are almost impregnably entrenched in the hills, and spoiling for a big fight with the pale-faces. Captain Lawson narrowly escaped falling into their hands on Wednesday, being pursued twenty miles and fired at a number of times."

DENVER dispatches give the following particulars of an engagement between Colorow's band of Utes and the militia, near Rangely, Col.:

The fight was opened at 6:30 p. m. near Rangely, about twelve miles west of Meeker, the Utes beginning the battle. The Utes who came into Major Lesley's camp on Wolf Creek the night before for a talk skipped out during a thunderstorm that night. Major Lesley at once ordered a mount, and the boys followed the Utes twenty miles, when they found the Indians in a natural trap. Joined by Kendall, with forty picked men and Pritchard's scouts, the troops and party came up with the Indians about daybreak. The militia and cowboys fought the Indians all day, and for three hours the battle was a hard one. Both sides fought Indian style, skulking behind rocks and firing at every chance. Darkness ended the battle. The Indians were all in a fighting way done on foot, as the horses of the troops Lesley were got by hard and rapid riding over the rough mountain trails. The Indians are said to have lost eight warriors in killed and wounded, and the troops suffered the following losses so far as reported: Jack Ward, of Meeker, killed; Jack Folsom, of Meeker, wounded; Ed Field, of Apex, shot through the lungs, dying; Ed Ryan, of Meeker, shot in the Cowboy; Leadville, wounded and seriously; Jay Dumont, of Meeker, wounded.

THE SOUTHERN STATES.

AN Austin (Tex.) dispatch says: "The Washington County election cases, which have been on trial in the United States District Court here for several days, were brought to a close by the jury bringing in a verdict of 'not guilty' on the second count, charging destruction of ballot-boxes by the defendants, and conspiracy with the intent to hinder and obstruct any interference with officers. Judge Turner in accordance with the verdict declared the defendants not guilty as to the second count and that there had been a mistrial as to the other counts, and they were continued until the next term of court."

It is stated the amount of money taken by Norman Roberts, of Baltimore, Md., will reach $400,000, which belonged to the Lonnain heirs. He lost $40,000 belonging to his mother in speculation.

DECATUR, six miles from Atlanta, was the scene on Saturday of a terrible riot between negroes and whites, the particulars of which are recited in a telegram from Atlanta:

There was an assemblage of negroes to attend a Sunday school convention and picnic. Fully 5,000 negroes being present. Decatur is a place of about 1,500 people, and the whites were in close schedule to attend to the picnic plenty of whisky. Toward evening a gang of the negroes began to create disorder. A few days ago a negro was lynched near Sedan, not far from Decatur, and this incident was the one most reported as being uneasy. This lynching seems to have had a good effect upon the negroes. A black rough, whose name is given as Hubbard, was quite drunk, and pulled a pistol and said he could whip any white man in the county. The preachers who were in charge of the celebration tried to get him away, and succeeded, negroes and whites. Hubbard went to Marshal Hurt and said he could whip Hurt. Hurt and Deputy Shrivers and one or two others started to arrest Hubbard. As they approached, the white fingers succeeded in getting Hubbard's pistol away from him, and he started off. The police station was him, but after going some distance were set upon by a crowd of negroes, who had secured Hubbard's pistol and his pals then fled. The officers got additional help and attempted their arrest. The crowd resulted him and the crowd he escaped, began firing upon the officers. The officers began firing back, and the battle became general. In the fire, One negro gave himself up to Marshal Hurt. Hurt was wounded in the right side and killed him instantly. Two negroes were killed outright, and about 20 in all, and the fire. Some crowd carry Hubbard was found dead and other negroes were wounded. The negroes fled.

EX-CONGRESSMAN GIBSON, of West Virginia, was fined $50 and sent to jail at Huntington, in that State, by Judge McGinnis, for contempt of court. Gibson and McGinnis have been at enmity for years, and the former, while trying a case before the latter, intimated that he was open to bribery.

THE POLITICAL FIELD.

THE Executive Committee of the new Prohibitory party organized in Chicago Wednesday under the name of the American party, have issued an official call for a national convention, to meet in that city on Friday and Saturday, the 16th and 17th of September, and they open a campaign for the support of the new party or special affiliation, who sympathize with the principles of the party, to attend the political objects of the new party, to attend for the purpose of completing the organization, and promoting, among others, the following objects:

1. To emphatic and perpetuate the sentiment of American Nationality, in the restriction of immigration. 2. A through revision of the naturalization laws, so that no alien can hereafter obtain citizenship in any State. The protection of Americans in all their rights, on land or on sea, wherever they may be. 4. To restrain and guard the right of the elective franchise.

THE Iowa Republican Convention, which met in Des Moines on Aug. 31, was very cheered every allusion to Blaine and Allison. Governor Larrabee and Lieutenant Governor Hull were renominated by acclamation. George S. Robinson was nominated for Supreme Judge on the fifth ballot, and Judge Sabin for Superintendent of Public Instruction on the fourth ballot. The platform contained two resolutions. The first expressions of the black vote in the South is viewed with alarm; the protection of the rights of suffrage reform are approved; the Cleveland administration is condemned; the interstate commerce act is indorsed and anti-monopoly legislation in the State demanded; a liberal pension policy is favored, prohibition is upheld; the usual message of sympathy extended to Ireland, and Senator Allison and Governor Larrabee's administration commended.

LEWIS R. MCCOMAS presided over the Maryland Republican Convention held at Baltimore August 24. The following ticket was nominated: For Congressman-at-Large, Louis Emory, of Baltimore; for Comptroller, R. B. Dixon, of Talbott County; For Attorney General, Francis Mason, of Montgomery County. The platform arraigns the President for not calling Republican officers who have disregarded his instructions regarding active participation in politics, which alleged short comings in the South, and has not collected and paid in the course of the last two years, about $4,000,000. There were eighteen seconds and twenty-one ballots before Judge Stokes succeeded in getting Hubbard's name withdrawn. The nomination was then made unanimous, but after going over the distance were set upon by a crowd of negroes who had secured Hubbard's pistol and his pals then fled. The officers got additional help and attempted their arrest. The crowd resulted him and the crowd he escaped, began firing upon the officers. The officers began firing back, and the battle became general. In the fire, One negro gave himself up to Marshal Hurt. Hurt was wounded in the right side and killed him instantly. Two negroes were killed outright, and about 20 in all, and the fire. Some crowd carry Hubbard was found dead and other negroes were wounded. The negroes fled.

THE JOURNAL

CHAS. J. GRIER, EDITOR.

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

THE Harbor Springs Republican has at last astonished everybody by buying a respectable-looking new head. Clark is to be congratulated.

THERE should be a law compelling all steamboats and other common carriers to give checks for baggage the same as railroads do. It would prevent much dissatisfaction and many losses.

WE are a little curious to know to what or whom the Democrat refers when it says: "The Democrat has been watching the move for some time, and could create quite a political sensation by giving the whole matter away."

THE Petoskey Democrat copied our proof of falsehood and misrepresentation in regard to Charlevoix on the part of certain hotel and land agents there, thus giving it circulation where it will do the most good. We trust the promptness with which this proof was furnished will have a tendency to check the villainous practice, and that we shall have but little more to complain of in this respect in the future.

THE editor of the Democrat talks incoherently about "proof" and "rules of evidence," and then attempts to disprove our statements by simply raising the amount of his bets that the Journal lied about the misrepresentation of Charlevoix by Petoskey hotel and land agents. What nonsense! Neither bets nor bluff will convince our people that the Journal is wrong, especially those whose attention has been called to the matter so many times in the past.

Acting-Commissioner Stockslager, of the general land office, has issued the necessary instructions to carry into effect Secretary Lamar's recent order restoring to settlement and entry the lands within the indemnity limits of and withdrawn for the benefit of the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha railroad company, excluding those selected on the main line from Hudson to Superior, the Wisconsin Farm Mortgage company, and the Wisconsin Central railroad company. About 225,000 acres will be restored by these orders.

IT is noticable that those business houses which are always underbidding their competitors regardless of the value of goods handled, are almost always found later on in the column of failures. Two notable recent examples, in printers' goods, are the W. O. Tyler paper company of Chicago, whose creditors accepted 22½ cents on the dollar; and W. St. Clair Ross & Co., paper manufacturers, of Cincinnati, who have failed with liabilities at $40,000, and assets at only $25,000. The prices offered by such houses are not safe figures to base business calculations upon. And what is true of this line of goods will apply with equal force to other lines.

We were told by a reliable man the other day—one well acquainted with the vessels that ply on the lakes, that a large proportion of the steamers pay no regard to the United States law requiring them to use kerosene oil of 300° test. There is small doubt, judging from the testimony of the survivors of the ill-fated Champlain, that all those lives were lost, and a great deal of property, because the owners of the Northern Michigan Line, or their employees were law breakers in this regard. There ought to be some system of inspection by United States officers through which captains, stewards and owners violating this law could be convicted and severely punished for thus jeopardizing the lives of their crews and passengers, and we would be exceedingly glad if Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, Cleveland and Buffalo papers should take up the matter and make it redhot for those lines which pay no attention to the law.—Record.

"Hunting the Ox."

A Portland (Maine) man who employed a number of small boys as berry-pickers was much afraid they would be devoured by mosquitos, and induced them to wear netting over their faces, a contrivance which they adopted with gratitude in their hearts until they discovered that there were no mosquitoes to be seen, but that the netting also proscribed berry eating. Then the infants made a concentrated kick for freedom, and got there.

The people are muzzled in a similar manner by the "protective" tariff. When they understand that this tariff is not for their protection, as is alleged, but to prevent the freedom of trade, and to permit syndicates to be formed that dictate the price, not only of what the people have to buy, but everything the producers have to sell, there will be a concentrated kick that will cause such class legislation to be abolished.

Half Fare to Detroit, Sept 14.

The society of the army of the Tennessee holds its twentieth annual reunion in the city of Detroit, on September 14th and 15th next. This army, with its great record, from forts Henry and Donelson to Atlanta and the sea, had for its commanders many of the great generals of the war. General Sherman is president of the society and will attend the reunion. General Sheridan, Mrs. Logan, and many distinguished guests will also be present. The exercises comprise business meetings, parade, boat ride, annual meeting, banquet, reception, etc. All railroads in the state give special rates of one fare for the round trip to all who apply. No special invitations are necessary. The citizens of Detroit extend a cordial invitation to every old soldier in Michigan, as well as the people generally, to visit the city at that time and meet the heroes of the army of the Tennessee.

THE RINGS IN TREES.

Some Curious Observations in Measurements of Forest Growth.

Every day some pet theory, long held and honestly venerated, is being demolished and sent to the limbo of myth with Tell's apple, Washington's cherry tree and other old acquaintances. Now the age rings in trees have to suffer limbo-ration, if the word may be allowed. Mr. R. W. Furras, an agent of the United States forestry department, who has given much attention to the age of a tree as indicated by rings, as well as to the period at which trees of different species stop growing and that at which the wood is at its best, has reached some conclusions of general interest. He says:

"Concentric or annual rings, which were once accepted as good legal evidence, fail, except where climate, soil, temperature, humidity and all other surroundings are regular and well balanced. Otherwise, they are mere guesswork. The only region within my knowledge where either rings or measurements were reliable indications are in the secluded, even and regularly tempered valleys of the Southern Pacific coast."

Annual measurements of white elm, catalpa, soft maple, sycamore, pig hickory, cotton wood, chestnut, box elder, honey locust, coffee tree, burr and white oak, black walnut, osage orange, white pine, red cedar, mulberry and yellow willow (nineteen species), made in southern Nebraska, show that "annual growth is very irregular, sometimes scarcely perceptible and again quite large," and this he attributes to the difference in seasons. As trees increase in age inner rings decrease in size, sometimes almost disappearing. Diminished rate in growth after a certain age is a rule. Of four great beeches mentioned in London, there were three, such about seventeen feet in girth, whose ages were respectively sixty, 102 and 200 years. Mr. Furras found twelve rings in a black locust six years old, twenty-one rings in a shell bark hickory of twelve years, ten rings in a pig hickory of six years, eleven rings in a wild crabapple of five years, and only twenty rings in a chestnut oak of twenty-four years. An American chestnut of only four years had nine rings, while a peach of eight years had only five rings.

Dr. A. M. Childs, a resident of Nebraska from 1854 to 1882, a careful observer for the Smithsonian Institute, who counted rings on some soft maples eleven years two months old, found on one side of the heart of one of them forty rings, and not less than thirty-five anywhere, which were quite distinct when the wood was green, but after it had been seasoned only twenty-four rings could be distinguished. Another expert says that all our northern hard woods make many rings a year, sometimes as many as twelve, but as the last set of cells in a year's growth are very small and the first very large, the annual growth can always be determined, except when from local causes there is in any particular year a little or no cell growth. This may give a large number on one side. Upon the Pacific coast of North America trees do not reach the point where they stop growing nearly as early as those of the Atlantic coast. Two hundred years is nearly the greatest age attained on the eastern side of the continent by trees that retain their vigor. 500 years is the case of several species on the western coast, and one writer is confident that a sequoia which was measured was not less than 2,376 years old.

At Wrangel, latitude 56 degs. 60 mins., a western hemlock, six feet in diameter at the stump, was four feet in diameter 122 feet further up the trunk, and its rings showed 432 years.

But in the Old Bartram Garden, near Philadelphia, are more than 150 years old, almost all the trees are on the down grade. The Queen Robert, England's pride, which is said at home to live 1,000 years, has grown to full size and died in this garden, and the foreign spruces are following suit. Silver firs planted in 1800 are decaying. The great difference in the longevity of trees upon the western and eastern coasts of continents in the northern hemisphere seems to be due to the warm, moist air carried by strong and permanent ocean currents from the tropics northeasterly, in the Pacific and Atlantic oceans, which make the climate both moist and equable in high latitudes. In Sitka, latitude 57 degs., as much as 100 inches of rain have fallen in a year, and the harbor is rarely frozen enough to hinder the passage of boats. In some winters scarcely any ice is seen.—Lumber World.

MICHIGAN MENTION.

Rev. Myron W. Reed, of Denver, Col., is spoken of as a possible successor to Henry Ward Beecher's pulpit. About the first of his church work was done in one of the churches at Hudson in this state.

It is reported that the Flint & Pere Marquette railroad company will soon commence running a line from Manistee Junction to Grand Rapids, a distance of sixty-six miles, with a branch to Muskegon, and ultimately one to Petoskey by way of Charlevoix.

A good grammar full of English as she is spoke, can be bought in Oakland county for 35 cents, but despite that fact the Eccentric credits a girl of that region as saying of a certain excursion: "Well, I am awful sorry to have missed it, but I didn't know of it in time, but if I had of knew that I could have went if I had come, I would have bin."

The tallest Escanaba girls live in the first ward, the prettiest in the second, the most accomplished the third, and those with the biggest feet in the fourth—so our devil says. Our opinion is, he doesn't known anything about them. One of them whom he was trying to bite the other evening said "don't—quit," and he didn't. If he were familiar with matters of the kind he certainly would. —The Delta.

Invalids and Long Life.

Care is a prime condition of continued health, even in persons who are physically vigorous, but up to middle life, the recuperative force is so strong and active that carelessness is the rule. Hence, persons who ought to live fourscore years and over, die at the age of 60 or under.

The consumptive—not neglecting medical aid—may do much toward holding his disease in check; perhaps may eradicate it. Let him spend a large part of his time in the open air and sunshine; take gentle exercise daily; keep the functions of the skin active, by means of friction night and morning, and the bowels in habitual good order; and ever while guard against taking cold. To settle back feebly into the arm chair of a sick room, and depend on the medicine of a physician—even the best physician in the world—is to hasten the progress of the disease.

Most people, when informed that their heart is seriously affected, feel as if there was but a step between them and death; but the heart is a very strong organ, and even when greatly obstructed or weakened, can manage, with the intelligent co-operation of the patient, to keep the blood carrying life through the arteries for many years. Often it has to force the blood through a thrivled opening not much larger than a goose quill; and this it does by working harder, thus causing its own enlargement.

But the enlargement may at length cause a dangerous thinning of some portion of its walls. Sometimes the walls of the aorta—the large arterial trunk into which the heart empties—lose their elasticity, and swell out into a great tumor (aneurism). Sometimes the tough fibers of the heart are changed to fat. In such cases a fatal termination may be long delayed by avoiding undue excitement.

So, too, the diabetic patient may fill out a good measure of life, provided he is willing to abstain rigidly from certain kinds of food. Every one knows how fatal Bright's disease is, and yet Bright himself, whose researches respecting it have given his name to it, died fifty years ago. With care, life may sometimes be prolonged many years, and without care it is generally shortened. The experience of half a century has confirmed and emphasized this truth.—Youth's Companion.

Medicine for Children must not prove to be effective but so compounded that no harm will result from the use. Such a preparation for worms (to which almost every child is subject) is Parmelee's Santonine Worm Candies, which are made from the best drugs, particularly adapted to this use. They work quickly, surely and harmlessly, passing off the worms after they are dissolved. Do not neglect the children even though they do not complain. Worms are almost always present. Give Them a Chance!

That is to say, your lungs. Also all your breathing machinery. Very wonderful machinery it is. Not only the larger air-passages, but the thousands of little tubes and cavities leading from them.

When these are clogged and choked with matter which ought not be there, your lungs cannot half do their work. And what they do, they cannot do well.

Call it cold, cough, croup, pneumonia, catarrh, consumption, or say of the family of throat and nose and head and lung contractions, all are bad. All ought to be got rid of. There is just one sure way to get rid of them. This is to take Boschee's German syrup, which any druggist will sell you at 75 cents a bottle. Even if everything else has failed you, you may depend upon this for certain.

LABOR DAY.

A Fine Day, Big Crowd, and Everybody Satisfied.

Labor had its fete last Monday at Charlevoix in celebration of the fifth annual national labor holiday. The mills, factory, and most of the shops were closed to give all hands a chance to celebrate, and to have a general good time.

The weather in the morning was all that could be desired. Before seven o'clock the principal streets were raked and sprinkled, and many of the buildings decorated.

Besides Knights of Labor, work men who do not belong to any organization, farmers, and all classes by the hundreds turned out with their families to enjoy themselves in a quiet manner. All of the morning boats brought large crowds from up Pine lake, and from Petoskey.

At about 11.00 o'clock a procession was formed at the rink, and moved through Bridge street in the following order:

Carriages with speakers.
East Jordan and Charlevoix bands.
Fire department.
Petoskey base ball club.
Charlevoix base ball club.
Charlevoix Assembly K. of L.
Visiting Knights.
Citizens in carriages and on foot.

The knights all wore appropriate badges, and nearly everybody wore a badge of some kind. Numerous flags, banners, and emblems were carried by those who marched. The column moved to Parmelee's grove, where, after an address of welcome, and prayer, a grand basket picnic was enjoyed by all. The knights of Charlevoix had spared no efforts to supply everything necessary for a general feast. The fatted calf (two years old) was brought forth and killed the evening before, and roasted whole.

In the afternoon, on account of the threatening rain, the scene of the celebration was transfered to the rink where speaking, and music by the bands was had. Rev. C. I. Deyo, Mrs. C. S. Barghoorn, and F. D. Phillips were speakers. Rev. Deyo spoke for an hour and a half in a very pleasing manner, in which he reviewed the labor movement, giving the object of the organizations and their line of work. He showed that the labor movement is not antagonistic to capital, only so far as to repeal laws which have a tendency to reduce the price and profit of labor and at the same time foster and build up monopolies. Labor is as necessary as capital, and no commonwealth can exist without it, yet there should be perfect justice and harmony between these two great powers.

The knights generally attended the game of ball at Dixon park in the afternoon, and the day's festivities closed with a ball at the rink at night.

The Charlevoix assembly is to be congratulated on the entire success of the holiday.

Last Monday night was school meeting. Particulars next week.

Dan Drigget, wife, and sister, Miss Lucy Drigget, have gone to their home in Wayne county, Mich.

Forest fires raged fiercely last week and the dense smoke was almost unbearable, but a generous shower Wednesday night quenched the fires and moistened the surface of the ground.

Farmers are cutting their corn, and are beginning to think of potato digging. Our farmers are also busy cutting fallow, burning, plowing, and making ready to sow their fall wheat; some fields of wheat are already sown. On heavy soil, where it is hard and dry, the farmer must wait for more rain.

The wheat, oat and pea crops are much poorer than was anticipated, consequently the owners of threshing machines are not going to get as fat as they thought for. When a farmer is asked how his wheat turned out his reply is, lots of straw, but no wheat. Fall wheat is reported to be the best.
Sept. 5.

Mrs. Kitson, of South Arm, and Mrs. Smith, of this place, went out near Deer Lake for the closing exercises of Miss Georgie Kitson's school. They report a pleasant occasion.
Sept. 6.

New Firm at South Arm.

W. S. Johnson, of Sutton's Bay has bought the interest of John Leng of the firm Leng & Draper, South Arm, and the new firm is A. F. Draper & Co. Both these men are well known hustlers and the new firm will at once take a front rank in the general mercantile business of Charlevoix and Antrim counties. They pay all cash for ties, posts, wood, and bark thus permitting their customers to buy in the best market or not at all, as they choose. Their large and increasing mercantile trade is proof that their prices are right, and that their methods of doing business are appreciated. Al Draper will have general management of the store and the buying and shipping at South Arm.

Shipments.

The following are the shipments from the port of Charlevoix, reported for the week ending Wednesday evening:

Sept. 1—Schr. Radical, 5,200 cedar ties, W. H. Downer, to Chicago.

Brace Up.

You are feeling depressed, your appetite is poor, you are bothered with headache, you are fidgetty, nervous, and generally out of sorts, and want to brace up. Brace up, but not with stimulants, spring medicines, or bitters, which have for their basis very cheap, bad whiskey, and which stimulate you for an hour, and then leave you in worse condition than before. What you want is an alterative that will purify your blood, start healthy action of liver and kidneys, restore your vitality, and give renewed health and strength. SHE DON'T MEAN IT, YOU KNOW

When the sweet little girl you have learned to adore
Refuses her smiles so far from free,
And insists, on the whole, you're a terrible bore—
She don't mean it, you know.

When second hot slim waist your arm you try to bruise,
In a manner persuasive and slow,
And she springs to her feet and pronounces you the limit—
She don't mean it, you know.

When you ask for a kiss from the red, pouting lips,
And her negative's faltering and low,
And take it if pressed you a sitting you trips,
And don't mean it, you know.

When alone in the parlor with her you hold dear,
And the hour is a wonderous one,
If she sits on a chair when the sofa is near—
She don't mean it, you know.

And when she says "No" to the question you ask,
With your heart in a flutter and glow,
Since kisses out of bed, when you take her to task,
She don't mean it, you know.

HER WANT OF LUGGAGE.

BY EVA MONTEITH.

HENEVER I find a woman who can travel without a thousand and one packages, baskets, valises, and bundles and be willing to carry something herself with her, I'll fall at her feet instantly and let her get up until she sets the wedding day. If you girls think a fellow's all hands, or do you intend to tie these to my back and around my shoulders? O, women are a nuisance, anyhow!

It was just like good-natured John Reed to grumble and scold, and do twice as much as was asked, and as nobody ever minded him more than he say, 'Now, Jack, you don't mean that,' he went on his way. Full of quirks and oddities, and yet with a heart soft as a gentle woman's.

He had three romping, laughing school-girls under his charge, and so complicate had they loaded him down with luggage that he had grumbled and fussed ever since they had started, much to the amusement of the young ladies who were used to his ways.

At the last moment a gentleman called Mr. Reed as he and asked if he would be so kind as to take charge of his sister, who was en route for the city to take a position as teacher in a large school there. In response to the introduction, "Miss Carlton, Mr. Reed," she only bowed, and then turned for a last good-by to her brother. Jack looked about him in dismay, frightened at the idea of an addition to his load, but could see nothing but a gray shawl snugly strapped, which she carried easily. Her traveling costume was neat and perfectly fitting, and there was an air of tidiness and composure about her that just pleased John's taste exactly.

He was listening intently to what Miss Carlton said, but when she ceased turned to Effie's side with some pointed remark about an entirely foreign subject, and when the girls had a chance to tease him about "this lady who had no luggage for him to carry," he only smiled.

He was listening intently to what Miss Carlton said, but when she ceased turned to Effie's side with some pointed remark about an entirely foreign subject, and when the girls had a chance to tease him about "this lady who had no luggage for him to carry," he only answered in his solemnly lugubrious style, "Time will show, time will show."

After a time the day grew hot and the way dusty, and, tired and worn out, the girls lost their liveliness and were content to lie back among the cushions and sleepily let the time glide away. Poor Jack, left to himself, sought Miss Carlton, expecting to see another "faded flower," as he emphatically declared each of his charges to be. On the contrary, she was wide awake, fresh as when they left home, no trace of weariness or fatigue on the bright face that was lifted from the book when he came to her. She was one of those women that dust seems to have no affinity for. "A tidy, neat body," as the old folks call them, "always look as if just out of a band box." She quietly cleared away her things from the adjoining seat and they soon were chatting away as though they had been friends for years, instead of the chance acquaintances of a few hours. Her voice was sweet and clear, and her language was refined and cultivated, but her manners were so free from all affectation, that John felt a composure and a relief from embarrassment in her presence that he rarely enjoyed when with other women.

The truth was he was in love; and the girls, fully awake now that there was something to interest them, were not long in understanding the case, and now prepared to tease most heartily the "clear old fellow," who was as bashful as a schoolboy.

But at dusk the city was reached, and after seeing his party safe at the academy John went home to his bachelor house, so abstracted that he was unconscious of the greetings of old friends. When alone there alone before him those clear hazel eyes, into whose depths he had looked that day for the first time, but that would ever be remembered. A fair face framed in not-brown hair, with a smooth brow, and faintly tinted cheeks, made a picture for him he should like he sought to recall clearer and more vividly hour by hour. "A woman who could take care of herself" had always been a bugbear to him, and he had challenged his girl friends to find, and now that he had known this quiet, demure teacher, he was still dissatisfied. Seeing that she was self-reliant, he was anxious to teach her to lean upon him, and knowing her ability to take her place among the world's workers, he longed to shelter her in his own home and toil for her, that she might not labor. He shrank from the thought of her being alone, and, with a great gush of love and sympathy, remembering his own solitary life, yearned to enfold her with a tender affection that should know no weariness.

But as the weeks lengthened into months, and the months rolled away, the distance seemed to lengthen between them, and the girls who watched with intense interest the wooing, liked to laugh and tell him he did not know how to "court a lady."

"Just ask her, John, if she'll have you. That's the way. O! you need not pretend that you don't intend to some day. Why, you might as well pretend ignorance of your own existence. Just give the world if she would say 'yes,' and yet you are not brave enough to try."

Miss Carlton received his attentions as she might those of a brother, quietly and yet with no affected reserve; she was always glad to meet him, but her manner was always polite to all and her urbanity uniform, and without seeming to avoid him, she never gave him an opportunity for anything more, and more confidential than she did other young men. John was sorely puzzled to understand her. His knowledge of women, either society belles or school girls, was totally different to the ways of this little woman who was either wholly unconscious of his love, or a flirt skilled in all of the arts of coquetry, and using her experience with a master hand to keep him close enough to charm him, and yet far enough to chill any declaration of love.

One day the girls burst into his office with a shout, "Some news, Jack, for you. You might as well give up now. You'll never get her. No use crying, John. You will have to accept one of us now, and so you might as well be thinking which one you prefer. We brought you a sprig of willow; that's what forlorn maidens and lovers do, you know."

"Now, girls, it's unfair to get a fellow excited this way. Who is this mysterious 'she,' and what shall I wear the willow for? I'ln a handful of candy to the one that tells me, and I'm easily understood story. Proceed, Effie; Grace and May are busy stealing my lead-pencils."

"Now, Jack, you know we mean Miss Carlton. She's the only woman you ever loved, and I don't wonder you like her. She's the only teacher that we girls can bear, and we all just worship her. Why yesterday, when we were bothering her you, Grace got to talking about you; she's always at that. I believe she wants to see herself, but she won't get you. You always did be long to me, didn't you, Jack? Bob your head—now—tell them she told Miss Carlton how you despised women who would not look out for themselves, and how you scolded us for having always such a lot of baggage. And then we all told her about that day she came in with us, and she said and said about courting the first woman you saw who carried no extra luggage. And I said, 'Well, whoever gets Jack Reed will have an easy time, for he's rich; and Grace snapped me up with, 'Yes, and she will have to be a teacher in a large school there. In response to the introduction, 'Miss Carlton, Mr. Reed,' she only bowed, and then turned for a last good-by to her brother. dragged by. He came occasionally, always the same cold kind fellow, and yet they felt a change they could not describe. He was more quiet and silent and yet at times when with Miss Carlton he seemed to forget his trouble and for awhile was the same romping, scolding "old brother," as he was generally called him. But of late his visits were less frequent and he rarely met the little teacher, as she, too, seemed to avoid him, but when she was in his parlor she took but little heed of him in the conversion. The school term wore to its close, and the girls, chattering and wild as a lot of magpies, surrounded John and pleaded with him to go home with them and have a "good time," and wondered why he grieved hastily at Miss Carlton and answered, "I'll go up home with you, Effie, but I cannot stay. I am going West in a month, but I'd like to tell your father and mother good-by." The slight form bent lower over the box and the shapely head, with its coronet of brown braids, was a little turned, but they would say 'yes,' and yet you are not brave enough to try."

enough last year, and now you want four women to look after."

"But I don't. I only want one of you, and her 'traps' won't worry me. I promise you." And he significantly lifted the gray shawl, and, laying it across his knee, seemed to be intent on smoothing the wrinkles and creases from its folds.

The girls looked at each other and then at Miss Carlton, and at the longest at Jack. He was an enigma. The tables seemed turned, and he alone of the party was composed, the girls being all curiosity, and their companion silent and thoughtful.

But the conversation drifted off to other channels, and soon they were deep in a discussion of the merits of their respective photographs. Jack was silent and thoughtful, but looked up in Miss Carlton's face and said,

"May I?"

She laughingly replied:

"I hardly know. It is the only one I have, and it is promised; but I will have some more soon, promised to my uncle in exchange for his, which I wear in my locket. By the by, girls, would you believe he could have danced so much in three years? I should hardly have known him when he came to the school to see me, he looked so expecting him. He was so deeply in love with all of you that I suppose I shall have to call you all aunties. He made me promise when he gave me my locket and my ring that I would give him a good picture; but, never fastidious, I had put it off and been taken off, as I have never done so. But there is a good artist, brother tells me, at home.

Jack leaned across the way and said, with the slightest perceptible tremulous tone, "May I carry your traps the rest of my life?" The girls gasped, and Effie declared him a petrified bear, but Grace persisted in taking his part, assuring them that she was broken-hearted when he thought of not being able to carry all of them, and called on Miss Carlton for proof.

"Miss Bessie, isn't that the reason? He is so selfish that the thought of anybody else getting one of us makes him so sorrowful." But before she could say one word Jack blurted out, with his gaze on the face before him:

"That's the very reason."

"Well, Jack," retorted Effie, "if you could have seen the fuss he made about our 'traps.' You made fuss

AS TO "PERSONAL LIBERTY."

Extract from Senator Reagan's Letter to Jeff Davis.

You object to this amendment because the world is governed too much. Our laws punish the dagger and the pistol, brass knives and brass knuckles, and punish those carrying them. The law punishes the punishment of many other things. Our laws have problem and which restrain the personal liberty of the citizen. Our laws have problem and provide for the punishment of many other things. Our laws have problem and which restrain the personal liberty of the citizen. You admit that the intemperate use of liquor is the root of many social disorders. No one can truthfully deny the baneful effects of the liquor traffic. But you think with many others that to prohibit it will be an abridgment of personal liberty. This is admitted. Personal liberty was abridged when God forbade our progenitors to eat of the fruit of the tree of life. The decalogue in the Holy Scriptures abridges personal liberty in nearly every commandment. The laws of the United States and of our several States are in a large measure made up of provisions for the abridgment of personal liberty. They do this in order to give protection to the persons, the reputations, the property of the people—to give peace and prosperity to society. They do it because government and civil society cannot exist without the abridgment of personal liberty. They do it for the good of society and the protection of the weak.

Is the liquor traffic an evil? Few have the hardihood to deny it. Most of the anti-prohibition orators of this State admit that it is. Then why not prohibit, except for the useful purposes mentioned in the amendment, as one prohibits other things and the use of other weapons? You justify refer to drunkards as "degraded criminals." We do not do as we justly may to prevent drunkenness and the crimes it gives rise to?

The great charter of English liberty, the portions of the Constitution of the United States which operate as a bill of rights, the bills of rights of the several States of the Union, may be analyzed in all their aspects, and it will not, generally, be found, in any one, anywhere, under any circumstances, protect personal liberty where its exercise is a crime or offends injuriously the interest of society. They not protect the right to carry deadly weapons without which men cannot be free; cannot enjoy either personal liberty or property rights. If the highest traffic is right, if it promotes peace, if it promotes prosperity, if it increases the happiness of the person, if it promotes the general welfare, if it is necessary in the means of maintaining our private or public rights and liberties, then I agree that all the provisions by the bills of rights and ought not to be disregarded. But if, on the other hand, it produces drunkenness, idleness and crime, if it leads to the waste of fortune, if it causes the impoverishment, disgrace and ruin of many, if it brings misery and poverty and the comforts of life and home, if it causes men to insult, abuse, maim and murder one another, if it increases the tendency to neglect, to abuse, to degrade, and to beat their wives and children—then I ask that it be done in with the protection of our bills of rights, and with the guarantees of our personal liberties which should be held inviolate.

THE SALOON IN POLITICS.

From the Toledo Blade.

Saloonkeeping is the only occupation in this country which is devoted to the sole purpose of pandering to the baser appetites and passions of mankind, yet the saloon keeper is ranked among legitimate lines of business. He is not a pauper, and, under law, he can never be recognized as an honorable and useful occupation. He pays it and all decent traffic there is fixed an impassable gulf, and, intimately in long as humanity recognizes the difference between good and evil, he will not, long, belong to the same category of occupations with the gambler, the fan, the malign influence of rum upon the physical system is so well known its terrible power to spur the baser passions and whet the sensual appetites—that there is not a person of intelligence or ethics but wherein rum in some form is kept, because demanded by the appetites of those who drink.

Rum is the facile agent of all kinds of evil. It is the prompter of crime, the spur to vice, the promoter of crime. The saloon is merely a place where men meet to drink and the argument that there is a demand for Rum on the part of those who do not drink is one that there is the keeper of the saloon, by opening a place where intoxicating beverages can be promptly supplied, is engaged in as reputable and honest an business as any other business that is manned for food or for clothing, is a serious one. There is a broad distinction between the supplying of things which are necessary to the well-being and comfort of mankind, and the supplying minister to tastes or desires which are harmless to those who use them, and work no injury, direct or remote, to the community at large, and that distinction is one that will never be lost sight of. It can not be obliterated; the men who deal in Rum will never be able to so confuse the public mind that it will not be recognized.

There is a striking parallelism between the course the supporters of the saloon are taking in this country and that taken by the supporters of the slave power years ago. The slave power was not satisfied with the condition of things. It determined to extend its domain. It was not satisfied to let slavery alone where it already existed. It was not satisfied to let territories, that they should become slave States when admitted into the Union. The dictum was laid down that a section of the country should rule the entire country, and to give that section a majority in Congress it was deemed necessary to extend the operation of man of human bondage by the extension of the national domain, that new States might be created, and slavery in turn should become States. But when slavery went into Kansas and aimed at not only national control but its perpetuation its doom was sealed. It has been dead for a quarter of a century. Politics killed the slave power. The rum power is paralyzed in the same general course. It has entered the political field. Through years a few days gone debased hangers-on, who will sell their votes—nay, who are such slaves of the rum devil that they would barter their immortal souls for the liquid poison if it could not be obtained otherwise. The saloons practically control many of our great cities, and have so strong a grip on the worst elements of the voting population that the question of honest municipal governments is the leading one in every city of importance in the country. Not content with this, the rum power is taking a hand in State politics everywhere, and aspiring to even control the land through its hold upon the weak, venal, depraved, and vicious element of the voting population.

The people of the United States found that the logical result of the slavery struggle would necessarily be that the country would be all slave or all free. The arrogant slave power practically presented them the alternative. They solved the problem by making the nation free and wiping slavery out of existence. The struggle with the rum power is rapidly bringing public sentiment to see that either the rum power must be destroyed or it will necessarily become supreme and control the politics of the country. The trial of strength between the two sides is as inevitable as the rising of the sun with the morrow was. Though civil war will not result, the end in this case will be the same. The rum power will be crushed, and the traffic be destroyed. The right always has the final triumph in the world-old struggle with the wrong.

The sure sign of the beginning of this much-to-be-desired end is the fact that the people are array themselves against the saloons. There are thousands of voters to-day who would hesitate to declare themselves in favor of prohibition, but who would, nevertheless, vote against a license law and for a prohibitory amendment to the State Constitution because of the inherent injury of the rum power, in politics. The thinking people of the land are beginning to see that the saloon is a political factor that attempts political control for its own ends. The great mass of them are strongly against it. They are attempting to dictate politics to the saloon in the end that they may continue to reap enormous profits from the weaknesses, the appetites, the ruin of their fellowmen. Events are tending to a crisis.

ENGLAND IS AN EXAMPLE.

Canon Wilberforce Says that England Is Ruined Under the Liquor Curse.

The telegraphic synopsis of Canon Wilberforce's address at the Academy in New York did not convey any adequate idea of his remarks. The ball was crowded, and upon the platform were clergymen of all denominations, and the audience was representing the various organizations.

Canon Wilberforce, who is a rapid but clear speaker, said that American hospitality had made some demands upon his physical condition that he would prefer to exchange places with the chairman, who, he was sure, could do better justice to them. In fact, he had been given to understand that speaking was not the thing he had on season were given to helping themselves free. Dr. Talmage was to speak, and his subject was "Gospel Temperance," the text of which was "Wine is a mocker." He brought the cases of destroyed hearts and homes. He did not, well as a day's discussion, and the only power to deal with it was the power of God. The Lord Jesus Christ did its duty no more successfully than the Christ who spoke to the woman of Samaria, and of the higher kind.

He was glad to see "temperance," continued the canon, "Young, beardless philosophers, indulging in the skepticism of the day, call themselves Freethinkers. Free! It is not freedom. It is an iron slavery to the worst of tyrants. Intemperance. I felt it a privilege to be allowed to speak in Brooklyn, where I was a boy, and he would be allowed to speak in Brooklyn, where I was a boy, and he would be allowed to speak in Brooklyn, where I was a boy, and he would SUGGESTIONS ABOUT THE SHOEING OF HORSES IN SUMMER.

A Hammock Tent Impervious to Mosquitoes and Flies—Indications That Insure Success in Rooting Cuttings—Drain Pipes and Sewers.

There is no longer any necessity for urging the importance of drains and sewers for carrying off the waste from houses and the surrounding grounds, for everybody admits this importance. Very many persons, however, with the best possible intentions lay their sewers and drain pipes in such a way as to augment instead of decreasing the evils for which the drains were designed.

PERFECT AND IMPERFECT DRAINS.

Mayor Wheeler, of Auburn, N. Y., in a pamphlet recently issued describes, with illustrations, the dangers which often arise from badly laid sewers and drain pipes. A common mistake is the one represented in the first figure shown in the cut. As will be seen, the cement pipe is badly laid, the projecting collars preventing the sections of the pipe from resting on a sufficient support. The consequence is, the earth above the pipes crack and breaks them, allowing the leakage of impure water and the escape of foul air through every opening. The remaining figure shows a pipe properly laid, being compactly bedded in earth so that the support is ample for the pressure, and breakage, in consequence, cannot occur.

How to Root Cuttings.

Many plants may be propagated with ease from cuttings, provided one knows just how to proceed. Susan Power, in American Garden, gives in detail some exceedingly careful directions, from which the following points are gleaned: The pots and soil, or cutting bed, should be made ready beforehand, so that slips may be promptly placed therein as soon as cut. The leaf cutting is a shoot of new growth, that before it grows woody at all or fibrous, but will snap off clean without strings. This should have three buds, if possible, though one leaf and leaf bud will start in good care. Roots start from the bud at the base of the leaf sooner than from any other part. Take off all leaves for an inch or two and stick the cutting in sand to the lowest bud. The essential thing is to keep cuttings entirely fresh till planted by setting in water, or, what is better, wrapping them lightly in a moist cloth. The loss of their sap by evaporation before or after setting is their death.

Boxes three inches deep, half filled with sand and a light mixture of fibry soil or leaf mold, faced off with an inch of pure sand, make good cutting beds when a number are to be struck, as with coleus, alternantheras and bedding plants generally, when one wants plenty to use and some to give away.

For a few cuttings, the best thing is a six inch flower pot, the drain hole plugged with a cork, two inches of broken bits of crock laid in, and a porous pot, half the size or less, set within the larger one and kept full of water. Between the rims of the two pots, which should be on a level, the space is filled with sand, in which the cuttings are set against the outer rim and well wet. The draining from the inside pot of water keeps the cuttings always moist, and they hasten to root. Sand is best, being easy for the tender root threads to enter and free from decaying particles, which in soil cause cuttings to rot at once. But when the first roots are made known by the freshening of the terminal bud or shoot, one should at once gradually pot or change to richer soil that has food for the plant, or it will lose strength. Prompt planting must be given.

Shade all cuttings for the first day or two, until the first shock of the change is over. When danger of flagging is past give cuttings the stimulus of light, shading from hot sun and wind. Seeds and cuttings never start more delightfully than under shades of oiled paper tied over the pot or tacked on the stake, or, if on ground, frames with oiled cotton covers should be used to protect tender cuttings from changes of temperature.

A Hammock Tent Impervious to Mosquitoes and Flies.

In Harper's Bazar Mrs. Lucy Cleveland Hall describes a hammock tent which she found a very comfortable and convenient thing for a lady who was camping out in the Adirondacks. It is made of a hammock and a piece of muslin, or other material, of the shape and size of a large shawl, with a hole in the middle for the head to pass through. When the wearer is ready to retire she lies down in her hammock, puts her head through the hole in the muslin, and then, by means of a cord and pulley, hoists herself from the ground, and ties the muslin tightly about her. She is then as much shut in from the mosquitoes and flies as if she were in a room, and can read, write, or sew at her ease. The illustration shows the tent when not in use.

A HAMMOCK TENT.

Indications That Insure Success in Rooting Cuttings.

Cut four strong sticks about five or six feet long and as thick as a man's arm. Point them and drive in the ground in form of a parallelogram. The a strong rope between the end sticks and fasten the hammock to them. If the tops of the sticks be bent over and tied together a little, a square of netting may be thrown over to protect the sleeper from insects, or a square of canvas in the day time to keep off the glare of the sun.

The hammock here illustrated is made of barred sticks lashed to two pieces of strong rope about eight feet long. In place of this can be substituted a twine or other hammock, such as are for sale at the stores, but the home made contrivance will be found much better than none at all.

The condition of the grape crop of the country is generally favorable.

There has been considerable enlargement of the area of potatoes. The largest rate of advance is in Dakota, Kansas and Nebraska. The average condition of the crop for the country is 93.

The condition of the sweet potato crop is generally satisfactory.

The Colors of Boston Houses.

The number of yellow painted houses with white trimmings which one meets on a drive a few miles out of town is remarkable, and red, which used to be reserved for barns, has taken a place on dwellings. It seems to me that this movement is a sensible one, within certain limits, but that these bright colors are most attractive when sparingly used. A house that stands at a distance from others will bear them, but rows of yellow and red houses make one long for a brown or even white painted dwelling to relieve their glaring monotony. I have heard it said that yellow should be reserved for the old colonial style of dwellings; but as this has become the rage, relief from an oppressive uniformity must be found in the adoption of a new key of color for houses of different architectural form.—Boston Post.

AN AMATEUR PROPAGATING POT.

Cuttings of quick growing Sarracenia plants, like helistoropa, verbena, coleus and alternanthanas root quickly, chrysanthemums soonest of all. Nearly all plants can be rooted in spring, still there is no month when cuttings cannot be rooted with care. Choose cuttings when the plant is most vigorous, and take strong shoots, that have stamina, to start well. But with all cuttings from herbaceous or wooden plants the rule must be to keep the roots warm and the top cool. Almost any shoot or slip will grow set in moist sand over hot pipes, with the top kept in cool air. A box over a pan of hot water or on a brick, in a cool room, where the sun plays freely, but does not strike the plants, is as good a start for cuttings as you can find.

A Dog Cured of Sheep Killing.

"A few years ago," writes a New York Tribune correspondent, "I saw a dog permanently cured of sheep killing. His owner tied him to the neck of an old ram, leaving the rope between them about six feet in length; not long enough to permit the dog to jump over the fence and hang himself and perhaps strangle the sheep too. It occurred in a small field. The sheep made several passes at the dog, which the brute successfully dodged, the dog all the time pulling and working his way to the fence; arriving there, he made an effort to scale it, but the rope held him, and at that moment the sheep gave him a whack which made him "kiyi" for certain. The dog then settled down in a corner of the fence, growling and apparently bidding defiance to his antagonist. The sheep stepped back, got the range of the canine and like the "animated battering ram" he was, gave that dog a blow which sent him out of his corner in a hurry. The dog then kept in the open field as the safest place. After a little more skirmishing the owner unyoked this unmatched team. The dog lived for several years after, but never molested sheep again."

Tips Versus Horseshoes.

In many cases tips, or a partial shoe, are to be preferred to the full horseshoe; indeed there are many instances in which farm horses and others driven on country roads need no shoes in summer and are better without them.

A correspondent in American Agriculturist tells of a horse he owned that had hard dry hoofs and contracted feet, which was caused by a natural tendency, increased by shoeing with high calks.

For want of use, the frog had withered away, and the horse was lame always. The shoes were taken off, and tips (see engraving) only were used. These were thin plates, reaching around the fore half of the hoofs only, to protect the toes from wearing away. The frog and the heels then came to the ground at every step; the bars were able to spread, and the proper functions of the feet, to preserve healthful action and growth, were given full play. The horse soon became sound, the frog grew healthfully, and the feet were in perfect order, while the expense of shoeing was greatly reduced.

TIPS FOR HORSES' FEET.

Leading Crops.

The present area in corn is about 78,000,000 acres, equal to the entire breadth of arable cultivation of the United States twenty years ago. There has been a decided change from wheat to corn in Kansas, Iowa, Nebraska and Minnesota. Even in Dakota the percentage of increase in area is about as large in maize as in wheat.

There has been a heavy decline in the condition of winter wheat in Kansas, a material reduction in California, with some loss in several of the southern states. A somewhat serious decline has also occurred in spring wheat, caused by the chinch bugs and drought.

The average condition of winter rye is reported at 98; of spring rye at 94.8. The general average condition of barley is 94.8. Oats are in excellent condition in New England and the middle states. In Mississippi westward the crop was harvested generally in low condition.

The status of the cotton crop has not declined since the last report. The average condition is 97, which is four points higher than the average at the same season in the previous ten years.

An Inexpensive Lawn.

A good hammock is a luxury that ought to found in every section of country during the summer season. The cut shows a contrivance by which, with small expense, a double luxury may be gained, viz: a hammock inside a tent. The tent part of the arrangement will be especially appreciated in localities where flies, musquitoes or gnats abound. A World contributor tells how to make it.

ALWAYS ON THE GO.

Why Trainmen Stick to a Hard and Very Uncomfortable Dangerous Life.

"We see many strange things in our life and many strange people. But for that existence would be a burden, scarcely a day would go by without something happening that would be a novelty to us, and you could not get a man to run on the road at all, for the pay is not great and the danger is not a little."

He was a trainsman on one of the many roads that run out of Buffalo, and had just finished his supper and was quietly enjoying a cigar. He was in a talkative mood and went on, pausing now and then to keep his cigar going.

"I don't know why it is but I am never contented except when I am on the move. I may be dull and depressed when down town, but the moment the conductor calls out 'All aboard!' and the engine pulls out, I forget everything except the bustle, rumble, roar and the swaying of the train. The rapid motion has an exhilarating effect, and as the trees and fields whir by my blood begins to tingle.

"Then a man makes friends at every stopping place, and there is always some one to say 'good-day' and 'good-by' at every station. You are always on the go, and there are always old friends and new faces at every turn. I like the life, and it is the excitement in it that keeps so many men tied down to it. You could not think we could not do better. Why, I have quite two or three times, and I did well, too, but I could not stand it, so I returned to the life again. Promotion is slow but sure, and a man who knows that a conductor's punch will surely come in time of his due and duty. It is all very well to talk of soulless corporations, but a railroad approaches an honest employer and treats him, if not more, than a bank president does an efficient clerk.

"I don't know why it is," he went on, after a few vigorous puffs, "but the brakeman—or trainman as he is now called—is a greater masher than the conductor. The shy country lass, the coy village maid, the attractive city girl is lady all take to us. One reason is, we are more obliging. We know full well the cares that annoy the conductor: people are not trying to best us, and we have no spotters watching us. I suppose it is necessary to put spies on the conductors, but I think as a class they are honest. Now and then one yields to a pitiful tale, but he is too good a judge of human nature to be deceived often. I often think that if the officials had to be tried and tempted as the conductors are they would make as many mistakes of the head and heart. I will give you one proof—if you wish to get a ride make your talk to the conductor before you board the train. He will do just as much for you then as he will when you strike him on board. A man who is honest never gets aboard and tries to beat his way, and no one knows this better than the conductor.

"No, we seldom get tips," he continued, "and a great many of us never take them. Of course, we can pick up many cigars, but they are more in the line of sociability than anything else. We have so many friends along the road that they are always doing something of the kind. I know one day I returned a book to an old gentleman who had left it in his seat as he changed cars here. He offered me a dollar, which I refused, but then thanked me very gracefully with a marked English accent. I found out afterward he was Herbert Spencer. I was glad then I refused the tip."

"I can give you another instance," he said, after another struggle with his cigar, "and this happened between here and Syracuse. We pulled out one night, and as I walked through the car I saw a young girl with a pinched face, dark red eyes and a hacking cough. I saw that she was a consumptive, and I made up my mind that she was hurrying home to die. I was all sympathy at once, and made up my mind that I would keep track of her and see that her journey was pleasant as possible. I watched along, and as I went by her I saw that she was suffering. I proffered my service, and she said she would like a drink of water. I got it and then I fixed the cushions and made her as easy as her all the help I could, and she finally told me her story. She had left home a week before at the Normal school at Albany, but she had broken down during the course of study. Now, I had a cousin there and I told her so, and she knew her. She became more confidential and she told me she was going home to die, and that the doctors had told her she could not live six months. When she parted I turned her over to the conductor on the next run, with all of time been a trainman with me. I never saw her again.

"It was a good six months afterward," he said, as he lighted his cigar, which had gone out, "when I heard that there was a reward offered to the trainman who had been kind to a sick lady on his train. I thought of my adventure, but I made up my mind that I was not the lucky man. Now, all the boys had a sick passenger, but none got the reward. One day in Syracuse a man came up and began to talk with me about my sick passenger, and wanted a description. I am a good hand at remembering names and faces, and I told him about her pinched face and her red eyes and cough, as I have told you. He told me that I was the man he was looking for, that he was sent to tell how she was dressed, and I did not miss that. Then he informed me that she had expressed to her deathbed that I should be well rewarded for my kindness. He told me that she had a little money, but that her mother was in rather poor circumstances. I am not very saving my self, but I have enough for my ordinary expenses. I thought of my own mother, and then I made up my mind that I did not want any reward, and I told them so. I knew that she was grateful, and I told them I did not feel the reward half as much as I did her remembrance of me. I never got the reward," he added, with an attempt at a smile, "and these are the only tips that I ever received. But I must report for this train, so that if the other man can't get I may take his run. If you ever take a run down our road go on our train. I will try and make it pleasant for you."—Buffalo News.

1887 AN INVITATION. 1872.
See then—the clouds are broken. Even now The woodland ways are greening, and a voice Pierced on each falling blade, fills all the air With voiceless murmurs, speaking to the soul.
Come, O and hear!—Autumn turns away, A little from life's killing care be tempted. It is not for to-morrow when spring is near; Elysium, now, is just outside the city; And paradise is open, for a little while. Come while you may, for life is not forever.
A little only, and then comes the end. And will ye toil on, making much of life, Stifling the hungering spirit's cry within you, Hearing to rest—until unnatural death Makes bold to lay you even with the clay? Then shall the sod bloom, and ye will not know; The branch shall blossom, but ye will not see; The soft winds woo—but ye shall rise no more!
Come then: O turn today!—a little turn From toil and care, while yet the heart hath feeling! Turn to the woodlands and the springing fields. The spicewood bath; the robin hath returned. Believe me, a little—a little—turning says Of all we gather at the spirit's cost. Laid for the sake of gold—dim the days Spent in such seeking are so much life lost.

SHE WRITES FROM CHARMING PALLANZA, ITALY.

Trouble at Milan in Finding a Famous Painting—Something About Americans Who Are Traveling Around—The Lakes of Italy—Her Opinion of Them.

(Special Correspondence.)

PALLANZA, Italy, Aug. 12.—I don't know exactly the size of the ignorance I carry over with me, but I am certain that until I bought my ticket to this place I never heard of it. It is a charming place, too, surrounded by history and beautiful scenery and summer resorters, and sits so close to Lake Maggiore that the foot of the street we live on hangs over into the water. We came here to take a little breathing spell before getting into or over the Alps, because beyond the Alps lies Switzerland.

To recur to the subject of ignorance, we had a manifestation of it in Milan, which gives me the courage to acknowledge that I never heard of Leonardo Da Vinci. At our hotel in Milan, which was in sight of the cathedral, I found it necessary to ask one of the English waiting men in the office the direction to the other great attraction of the city, to wit, "The Last Supper," a picture familiar by copies to every Sunday school scholar in America. So in an off hand, sort of course way I said to him:

"Where is the picture of Da Vinci's picture of the Last Supper?"

"Mean?" said he, with a twenty centime interest.

"Where Da Vinci's 'Last Supper?' thinking he hadn't understood me.

"Do know," said he, the repeated questioningly, as he scratched his head thoughtfully.

"Yes," said I, "Da Vinci's 'Last Supper,' a famous picture; don't you know where it is?"

"No mean, I don't know," he said, and I fell out up the head waiter.

"He can't help you," said he, "he's a foreigner, he don't know where he is!"

"Then," said I, "I'll go to the head man. I'll call up the head waiter."

The head waiter came in his hilling place, and with stately tread he crept up behind his proposed, unsuspecting victim.

"Come over! Come—! Come—!" "Come over! Come—! Come—!"

"Do you know where is the picture of the Last Supper?" I asked.

The head waiter was thrilled, but the echoes took it up and thrilled the entire hotel. In one minute

"Come-o! Come-o! Come-o!" they repeated as they hurried from the dining room to the shores; and when Heinrice found her there the waiter had stood by and laughed his grief to scorn, but not for long.

"Heinrice saw them, and for a hundred years she stood musing as the sun went down from misty forms rose from the valley, and, morning, at the first ray of light, her lips peeled heard the words, 'Come-o! Come-o! Come-o!'

"And that's how the lake got its name."

Extreme Arctic Cold.

A person who has never been in the polar regions can probably have no idea of what cold really is; but by reading the terrible experiences of the travelers we find icy region some notion can be formed of the extreme cold that prevails there. When we have the temperature down to zero out of doors we think it bitterly cold, and if our horses were not so warm as at least, 50 degs. above zero, we should begin to talk of freezing to death. Think, then, of living where the thermometer goes down to 40 degs. below zero in the house in spite of the stove. Of course, in such a case the fur garments are piled on until a man looks like a great bundle of skins.

Dr. Kane, of the English polar expedition of 1875 and 1876, among other cold things, tells of the effect of cold on a wax candle which he carried with him. The temperature was 35 degs. below zero, and the doctor may have been considerably discouraged when, upon looking at his candle, he discovered that it refused to burn, and was too stiff to keep warm. It was so cold that the flame could not melt the wax so as to flow down the candle, leaving it out of shape on the candle, leaving a sort of shade out of the candle standing. There was heat enough, however, to melt oddly shaped holes in the thin walls of the wax, and the result was a beautiful little cylinder of white, with a tongue of yellow flame issuing from each hole and sending out into the darkness many streaks of light. This is not only a curious effect but it shows how little heat was left in the candle, and how difficult it is to find anything like warmth in a place where even fire itself almost gets cold.—Scientific American.

Insanity in Paris.

The increase of insanity in Paris and its suburbs is exciting a great deal of comment, the more so as it has been observed that the sufferers from this rigorising malady are chiefly to be found in literary, financial and political circles. Life at the French capital is as a maelstrom, whether in the chambers, on the bourse, among the journals or at the clubs, that engulfs thousands every year in its hidden depths.—San Francisco Chronicle.

SCORES ROASTED ALIVE.

An Appalling Disaster Results from a Theater Fire at Exeter, England—Dancers Burned, Suffocated, or Crushed to Death in the Fearful Struggle to Escape.

Over one hundred lives were sacrificed by the burning of a theater at Exeter, England. A dispatch from London gives the following particulars of the disaster:

The "Bonnaye Boys" were under performance, and the pit and gallery were packed. The play proceeded all right until near the end of the third act, about 10:30 o'clock, when, as one of the characters was falling into the trap the drop-scene suddenly fell. Laughter in the house at this, as it was thought to be a stage blunder. In a moment, however, the scene bulged out in the center and a sheet of fire shot out, and it was seen that the whole stage was on fire. In a panic the people in the gallery, composed of clerks in the city and shopgirls, fled pell-mell away, after a deal of crashing and fighting, many, especially women, being severely bruised and carried away in a fainting condition. The actors and actresses, who are nearly all in the dressing-rooms, at the back of the stage, had a narrow escape, and filled the house with suffocating smoke. The occupants of the upper circle and gallery rushed in numbers to the lower tiers, screamed for ladders. As soon as possible these were brought, but many persons had jumped into the street, injuring themselves more or less, some more or less hurt. Others got up on a veranda over the door and some jumped and others were taken off. The theater by this time was blazing furiously, lighting up all the city, and people were running to the place from all directions, in fear or relatives. The fire-crush soon came on the scene and took off some more people. One hundred and thirty dead bodies were taken from the ruins. They were all frightfully burned, chiefly about the head and legs, the majority of them were men and boys, although there were a few women among the stretchers placed, and they were apparently for the most part occupants of the gallery.

LABOR DAY IN CHICAGO.

Fifteen Thousand Men Parade—No Red Flags Visible.

A CHICAGO dispatch of Tuesday says: "The big labor parade yesterday was one of the most successful ever held in the city. It was about as successful as plenty of people, plenty of brass bands, plenty of flags and banners and regalia, and plenty of enthusiasm could make it. Every sidewalk along the line of march was completely jammed with spectators, and in the business district every window and housetop was crowded. The applause along the line was frequent and generous. There were over 15,000 men in line, and the parade was witnessed by a quarter of a million people. There were no red flags displayed. The assemblyists had been notified that their absence from the procession would be acceptable."

International Medical Congress.

The President of the United States at Washington City, on Monday, the 5th inst., congratulated the country upon the presence at the capital of "so many of our own citizens, and those representing foreign countries, who have distinguished themselves in the science of medicine." He was referring to these complimentary terms to the five or six thousand doctors gathered in Washington to attend the Ninth International Medical Congress, which body President Cleveland, after the brief remarks quoted, proceeded to declare "open for organization and the transaction of business." The Congress elected Dr. Nathan Smith Davis, of Chicago, as President. In his speech Dr. Davis paid an eloquent tribute of respect to Dr. Austin Flint, of New York, who died early last year. A hundred vice-presidents were elected, including all the foreign delegates sent by their respective governments. The only Americans on the list were ex-Presidents of the American Medical Association, and the Surgeons General of the army and navy.

Started the Fire with Oil.

MRS. MARY DUSLAP and her daughter-in-law Bridget Duslap had been arrested in Scott near McKeesport, Pa. The women tried to start the fire in the kitchen stove with carbon oil and an explosion followed, which set fire to the women's clothing and also to the house. Before assistance arrived the house, with its two occupants, was entirely consumed.

A CHICAGO dispatch of Wednesday says: "The Herald this morning contains the following:

The seven condemned Anarchists are to hang. There is no longer room for doubt. Information has been received through reliable channels that the Governor will commute the death sentence against the Anarchists when they appear before him next Monday. The opinion in the case will then be read by the Judges who made it, and it will receive the signature of all the other justices, except Mr. Lawrence, who is fully acquainted with the decision. Mr. Lawrence has stated that he has given out this intelligence directly at of them, in fact, refuse to talk about the decision, but to a friend who recently asked him if it was true that Judge Magruder guardedly said: 'There will be no interesting news for you next week.' These are all of one mind, namely, that Governor Oglesby is entertaining a very decided opinion adverse to the fate of the men, which was not favorable to the claims of the Anarchists, and his friends think that if the commutation of the sentence Tuesday was for reversing the verdict of the Supreme Court he would immediately write a dissenting opinion. The case has already been decided by ballot, and the verdict would have been unanimous for affirmance. Such an opinion could have been prepared easily and promptly, and would have been issued, if there was any doubt in the Governor, that the Supreme Court, which has the task of preparing the opinion, would not get it out early enough for a few weeks ago. When the ballot was cast, after the Justices had heard the argument, it was considered that there was found that length considered a strong voice; the vote was taken by calling the roll, and Justice Mc-Allister was the only one who voted in favor of a reversal of the lower court.

A Washington dispatch states that Indian Commissioner Atkins has sent a dispatch to Indian Agent Soulsbee, at the Southern Ute Agency in southwestern Colorado, directing him to forthwith remove from the reservation all persons found thereon whose presence in any way tends to disturb the peace and quiet of the Indians, and if found necessary to call upon the military for assistance. This action of the Commissioner is based upon information that certain interested parties are trying to incite the Indians to hostilities.

A special from Princeton, Mo., says: "At the Mercer County fair on Thursday afternoon Randall Blakeslee, a half-breed Indian, made a balloon ascension, hanging to a trapeze bar. In the ascent the balloon struck against a swing Blakeslee a severe wrench, and he was unable to pull himself on the bar, but managed to hold himself up by a loop which he had drawn around his wrist. After traveling about a mile and a half, reaching an altitude of 2,000 feet, the balloon began to descend, but the poor fellow's strength gave out, and when within 500 feet of the earth he grip relaxed, and he fell to the earth, lighting on his feet in a corn-field, his thighs being broken and driven into the trunk of his body. Death was instantaneous."

FLAGSTAFF (Arizona) telegram: "A fend of long standing between Tewksbury and Graham was resumed two weeks ago in an encounter in Pleasant Valley, in which three men were killed. Several engagements have occurred since, in which eleven men have been killed. The factions are cattle and sheep men, and the fight is the outgrowth of conflicting interests of the two branches stock-growing on the range."

COLUMBUS (Ohio) special: "Josiah Terrell, of Meigs County, convicted of killing Charles Phelps, an old miser in the same county, was executed in the Ohio Penitentiary here just after midnight Friday by Warden Coffin. Terrell was convicted on purely circumstantial evidence, but stoutly protested his innocence to the last. He maintained a firm demeanor on the scaffold and said the blood of an innocent man was upon the officers."

A DENVER dispatch reports that at the conference between Governor Adams and Gen. Crook the latter agreed to place two companies of Government troops on the line to protect settlers, and the Utes are to have their horses back. Warrants for the arrest of Indians are to be given into the hands of United States officials. The war is practically at an end.

THE "White-Caps," a lawless mob in Harrison County, Indiana, took John Hillebrand, a Justice of the Peace, from his bed and beat him to unconsciousness because they disapproved his decisions. They have also signified to a number of citizens that they disapproved of their choice of a prospective husband.

LEO CRANE (Wis.) telegram: "The Land office here has received instructions regarding the opening of the Wisconsin Central and Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Omaha indemnity lands by homestead and pre-emption only. The lands restored are those which lay twenty-five miles beyond the Central and Omaha lines not previously selected and approved, and comprise about 225,000 acres, much of which is valuable pine lands. Thirty days' notice will be necessary before the lands can be entered by settlers."

THE SOUTHERN STATES.

THE famous Glenn bill was shelved in the Georgia Legislature, but a resolution was passed submitting the enforcement of the recent law against the lessees of the convict labor system to the Governor to refuse to draw his warrant for the Dahlonega University until he is assured that it will be used exclusively for the education of colored children.

In the South the corn crop will exceed that of 1886 by over fifty million bushels, and that section of the country will be nearly self-supporting in the matter of corn.

BENTONVILLE (Ark.) special: "Almost 2,000 survivors of the battle of Pea Ridge or Elkhorn, as it is called by the Confederates, assembled on the battlefield Thursday. Most of the survivors were of the majority, but the Union forces were fairly represented. The most fraternal greetings were exchanged, and hearty good-fellowship prevailed. Mountains and statues were unveiled to the memory of dead, among them a statue to General McCulloch."

THE RAILROADS.

A NEW YORK dispatch says that after a long interview of capitalists at the office of Drexel, Morgan & Co., the following was issued by the firm named: "A preliminary contract has been executed between the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, Baring Brothers & Co. and Brown, Shipley & Co., London, and their allied houses on this side. This contract provides for the negotiation of $10,000 Baltimore and Ohio consolidated 5s and $5,000,000 Baltimore and Ohio preferred stock, for the purpose of paying off the entire floating debt of the company and placing it on a sound financial basis. The conditions are as follows: 1. The verification of statements, etc., is made. 2. The management of the company shall be placed in competent hands, satisfactory to the syndicate. 3. That satisfactory contracts shall be made between the Baltimore & Ohio and the other roads for the New York business, which shall remove all antagonisms between them on the subject, and secure the permanent working of the Baltimore & Ohio in entire harmony with the other trunk lines; also avoid the construction of expensive parallel lines north and east of Philadelphia. The bonuses interested on this side are Drexel, Morgan & Co., Drexel & Co., Brown Bros. & Kidder, Peabody & Co."

THE POLITICAL FIELD.

IN the Democratic State convention at Allentown, Pa., J. Ross Thompson was nominated for Judge of the Supreme Court, and Bernard J. McGrann for Treasurer. The platform was remarkably free from Scott. It demands that the surplus in the National Treasury be used to pay the public debt, favors a "wise and prudent reduction of internal taxation and of duties on imports," and informs the President and Secretary Cleveland, favors "liberal pensions to deserving Union soldiers," expresses "deep sympathy for the people of Ireland in their struggle for Home Rule, and congratulates Parnell."

We still hold to the ancient doctrine of the party that the government of the People, by the people demand that we should "pass the public money as rapidly as we can restrict corporate power without business disaster, and we approve the action of the national administration in reducing the surplus revenue by taxes on people for settlement 100,000,000 acres of land in the Northwest, and in the Southwest, and fully held by corporations, and in the case of the Pacific roads, for failure to comply with the conditions of their grants."

A DES MOINES dispatch of Thursday says: "The Democratic party in Iowa finally passed out of existence here yesterday. After the convention had been in session for two days, eliminated the Greenback leaders in Iowa fell into line, and the ticket was made up, the State convention was in the party here—one half by Greenbackers, the other half by the Congressman Weller. Both plotted to capture the convention, and both succeeded. Then the Weaver faction rolled. Delegates were seated, and about forty delegates present. Serious differences of opinion developed, Weaver contesting for the Democratic ticket and straight nominations. A compromise was finally effected by which the Weaver party becomes a thing of the past in Iowa, and the Democratic ticket and resolutions were adopted, adopting the Chicago platform, and leaving on the farmers to immediately call a nominating State convention to place an independent ticket in the field.

THE Iowa Democracy assembled in State convention at Des Moines on Thursday, the 1st inst., and made the following nominations: For Governor, Maj. T. J. Anderson; Lieutenant Governor, J. M. Elder; Supreme Court Judge, Charles S. Mott; Superintendent of Public Instruction, H. W. Sawyer. Following is a synopsis of the platform:

It commends the fidelity of President Cleveland to the obligations of his high trust, and congratulates the country upon the economy, courage, honesty and patriotism of his administration; approves the civil-service policy; demands a reduction of the Navy Department; demands Congress to remove the duties on lumber in the interest of equal taxation, and favors retaliation if the Canadian Parliament refuses to remove the duties on lumber; favors the Chicago platform and the action of the Congressional Democratic party, thing before Congress; denounces the action of Gov. Pattison in undertaking to be the Democratic personal representative of Cleveland, favors the appointment is favorably received in Democratic circles.

THE New Hampshire Democratic Convention has been called to meet at Saratoga Sept. 27.

THE FOREIGN BUDGET.

IT is reported that the British Cabinet has decided to modify its position and will announce to the Irish National League so that it shall apply to certain districts only.

The order of eviction on Tom O'Grady's estate at Herbertstown was begun on Wednesday, says a London dispatch, but 14 farm families were turned out.

The crowds attracted by the evictions became very demonstrative in their sympathy with the tenants and the sympathizers were given to several occasions to charge and disperse them. The police also arrested several persons and piled their fathers upon them, and in several cases the women and children were injured by the rough treatment they received. The people are seriously. Among those clubbed by the police were Father Cummins, the parish priest, tor East Tipperary, and several Protestant ladies who were present to witness the attack by attempting to plunge the Widow Ryan into a stream of water, the police prevented her from the wall, while some bailiffs and others were busily engaged in the transaction of that way. The evictors were repulsed with great loss. The police, it is said, were not so land, then tried their powers, but were driven back with great loss. The bailiffs then tried attack on the house, but were driven back

The state fair opens at Jackson next Monday, the 19th, and continues during the week.

The Conference Daily Advocate is printed at the office of the Petoskey Independent. Hampton seems equal to any job that comes along.

The sixth annual fair of the Allima county agricultural society will be held at Bellair, Sept. 28, 29, and 30. C. E. Guile, of Bellaire, is secretary.

The ninth annual fair of the Western Michigan Agricultural and Industrial Society will be held at Grand Rapids, beginning the 19th and continuing until the 23d. H. C. Sherwood, of Grand Rapids, is president.

It cannot be denied that Cleveland's administration has increased his strength with the people. He is to-day by far the most available man the democrats have. And it now looks as if his renomination were certain.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

President Cleveland's administration has been in the main a success, considering the high standard to which it has been held. It can no longer be claimed that the republican party alone can govern, and nothing but sheer strength of the republican position in candidates and platform can restore that party to power. —Springfield Republican.

No defender of the war tariff has been able to answer the question, why an average duty of twenty-eight per cent. was adequate for protection twenty five years ago while one of forty-five per cent. is required, according to protectionist views, now that our boasted industries are no longer "infants," but many of them strapping monopolies half a hundred years old. —New York World.

The Southern Lumberman says: "If the president and Mrs. Cleveland should visit Nashville, and there is going to be a tremendous effort to induce them to do so, they will see the largest, most loyal and enthusiastic crowd they ever beheld. Our Tennesse women would turn their cows and calves together, and the men let the grass grow higher than their corn just to get a glimpse of the most popular president and his wife since Old Hickory' run the government."

Louisville Courier Journal: When newspapers and politicians talk to farmers about the home market they are trying to get their votes under false pretenses. To test the sincerity of these men, ask them if they would favor a bonus from the government of $6.72 on a bale for every bale of cotton raised. The farmers have just as much right to this as the furnace owners have to a tax of $6.72 on pig iron. Judge Kelley, of Pennsylvania, is preaching protection to the south. Is it possible to get him to introduce in the house next winter a bill providing an export bounty of $6.72 a bale on cotton, and a similar bounty for wheat? We think not.

One of the most important and radical changes in the method of administering public affairs, since the republican reign gave place to the democratic party, is the policy adopted by the government in exacting from the favored corporations, such as land grant railroads, the most strict compliance with the conditions of their charter. Some of these railroads had fallen into the habit of almost entirely ignoring the conditions of their existence whenever it suited their interests to do so. It is almost impossible for the mind to conceive the magnitude of the magnificent public domain restored to the people under President Cleveland's administration, for only last week in the case of the Atlantic and Pacific railroads alone between twenty-five and thirty millions acres of land were thrown open to settlement, to say nothing of its effects upon a number of other land-grant railroads.

All Against the Farmer.

Every interest in the country appears to be combining against agriculture. We have syndicates to control the prices of everything the farmer is compelled to buy, while he is utterly unable to control the prices of what he is compelled to sell. His selling prices are determined by those of the markets of the world. His buying prices are determined by combinations of manufacturers and merchants whom the government protects from all outside competition.

Take the protection which enables makers of iron and steel to combine against the farmers. It is fully 50 per cent. And it is worthy of note that, in the last statement of the secretary of the Iron and Steel association, this protection is added to the cost of these materials as sold in this country. Now what effect, in times of low prices of his products, has the farmer for this enormous taxation? None in the world.

On the contrary, it is during such times of low prices as the present for farm products that the various anti-farmer syndicates are the busiest in devising ways and means of still further depleting the farmer's pockets.

The latest anti-farmer syndicate is that just opened at Peoria, Illinois. It is composed of the manufacturers of corn-planter and check rowers, and is called a protective association of such. Its ostensible object is the maintenance of uniform prices, terms, and discounts to the trade. Its real object is to deprive the farmer of the benefits of trade competition.

Now it is well known that farmers have this year suffered enormously from drouth. Their loss from this cause is estimated by a leading mercantile agency at $300,000,000! Yet it is at such a time as this that the latest manufacturing "combine" takes occasion to jump on them with both feet, in order, as it were, to give them their comp de grace.

Such combinations as these are not only criminal, but indisputable evidences that our conscienceless tariff is eminently provocative of a system which seeks to set at defiance the only known method of determining the relations that should exist between producer and consumer.—Chicago News.

INGNTON, Sept 13.—More rain Monday night.

It has been winter like the past week. Last Friday was a freezer.

Another small cyclone passed over this place last week. It lasted three days.

Miss Lottie Webb who has been spending the past two weeks with her aunt, Mrs. Bedwin, left on the Friant for Petoskey last Thursday for a short visit before returning to her home in New York.

Services at the Congregational church next Sabbath at 3 p. m.

The industrial school will meet at the Congregational church tomorrow (Friday) afternoon.

William Robinson, who has been a resident of Ironton, for the past four years, started last Friday for Canada, his former home. Will, while a resident of Ironton, has made many friends, who will miss him from their company. We wish him good luck.

J. M. Harris, who has been engaged as clerk in G. W. Crouter's drug store at Charlevoix the past two months, returned to Ironton on the 6th inst.

The town board met at the ferry on Saturday.

The Ironton school district is to have a well.

At the annual school meeting in district No. 3, John Dunlop was elected director and E. G. Jarman moderator to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of G. McDonald. In district No. 4, Lot Allen was elected moderator.

Frank Cuter now wears an unusual large eye, the results of a fight with a bee. Yes, they are small, but "they get there all the same."

Uncle Robert Hood has some of the finest Concord grapes we have ever had an opportunity of seeing. They are just immense. He will have samples at the county fair.

Miss Lena Hillegas celebrated her 17th birthday Thursday, with a dance in the evening. A number of nice presents were given, and a jolly good time reported.

Wm. Bishop, wife, and child, with his household effects, left on the Friant on the 5th inst. for Mancelona, where they will make their home. Miss Lole Stacy also went with them.

Will Hayes, of Advance, was around through Eveline taking orders for enlarging photographs.

The Pine Lake Iron Co. have recently completed 150 feet of new trestle work on the south end of the east dock, thirty feet high, with two hoisting machines, and all necessary tracks, for unloading ore and coal from barges and vessels and dumping for the convenience of the furnace. The dump-cars hold a ton of ore or coal. The steamboats W. P. Tiaw has been in commission all the season, and makes the round trip from St. Ignace in about 24 hours, carrying about 400 tons each cargo. The furnace is now making an average of about 60 tons of iron per day.

The schooner Narragansett is carrying pig iron, 550 tons each cargo. Her last trip was to Chicago.

Ellsworth.

ELLSWORTH, Sept. 13.—Warm and pleasant to-day after last night's rain.

Farmers are busy husking their corn.

Five or six hunters passed here this morning on the lookout for game.

Mr. Krum, wife and daughter, and Arthur Funk, of the Chicago Row, at Charlevoix, spent a few days here last week.

Mr. and Mrs. Bicknell, state temperance workers took dinner with us Sunday, they were on their way to Central Lake, and Bellaire.

Barnard.

Come at last,—rain.

Miss Chew, of Hayes, is hired to teach the winter term of school.

Mr. Adam Clark will preach here Sunday, at 3 o'clock p. m.

Mrs. Harkness is on the sick list.

Shipments.

The following are the shipments from the port of Charlevoix, reported for the week ending Wednesday evening:

Sept. 8—Schr. Mocklnghird, 135 cords wood, W. S. Strip to Milwaukee.

8—Schr. Augusta Ford, 165,000 feet hardwood lumber, White & Perkins to Detroit.

9—Schr. John L. Green, 25,000 feet hardwood lumber, 45 cords wood, A. T. Boice and N. F. Peterson, to Sheboygan.

9—Schr. Lottie Mason, 65 cords bark, A. F. Draper to Milwaukee.

10—Schr. W. A. Smith, 34 cords bark, L. G. Grisbeck, to Milwaukee.

14—Schr. B. F. Wade, 400 M. R. ties, W. H. Dover to Chicago.

13—Schr. Crosman, 220,000 feet hardwood lumber, A. W. Olds, to Detroit.

Worth Knowing.

Mr. W. H. Morgan, merchant, Lake City, Fla., was taken with a severe cold, attended with a distressing cough and running into consumption in its first stages. He tried many so-called popular cough remedies and steadily grew worse. Was reduced in flesh, had difficulty in breathing, and was unable to sleep. Finally tried Dr. King's New discovery for Consumption, and found immediate relief, and after using about a half dozen bottles found himself well, and has had no return of the disease. No other remedy can show so grand a record of cures as Dr. King's New discovery for Consumption. Guaranteed to do just what is claimed for it. Trial bottles free at ar. Crouter's drug store. 4

Medicine for Children must not only be effective but so compounded that no harm will result from the use. Such a preparation for worms (to which almost every child is subject) is Parmelee's Vermifuge. Worm Candies, which are made from the best drugs, particularly adapted to this use. They work quickly, surely and harmlessly, passing off the worms after they are dissolved. Do not neglect the children even though they do not complain. Worms are almost always present. Price 25 cents per box. Sold by G. W. Crouter. sept

One of the Invalids.—E. M. PARMELEE, Dear Sir:—I have been taking your Dyspepsia, Diabetes, Kidney and Liver Cure for some time past and have received more benefit from it than from all of the $500 worth of doctor's medicines that I have used in the last few years. Before taking the cure I was weak and tired out all the time but now I can work all day without fatigue. Would not be without it in the house. Believe it is one of the best medicines in the world. Yours, ROBERT A. LOUGHSHEVE, JR., Somers Lane, Pa.

Quick Relief.—Hamilton's Jamaica Ginger Tonic and Pain Cure is not only a valuable internal remedy for all stomach and bowel difficulties such as dyspepsia, indigestion, heartburn, flatulence, diarrhœa, dysentery, cramps, and colic, but cannot be excelled for an outward application in rheumatism, neuralgia, sciatica, sprains, side and backache and chronic ailments in any part of the body. Used freely with warmth and rubbing it gives quick relief. Price 25 and 50 cents per bottle. Sold by G. W. Crouter, sept

Almost Marvelous, the way Parmelee's Blood Purifier works up on the human system. It is such a thorough Purifier, it strikes at the root of the disease and by its perfect workings effects a cure almost before the patient is aware. It seizes upon every particle of poisonous matter in the system, expels it and instills new health and vigor through the entire body. $1.00 per bottle. Sold by G. W. Crouter. sept

Look at the date on the yellow address label on this paper, and see if you owe the printer. If you do, come and see us. If the slip does not show a credit the week following payment, please notify us at once, that the omission may be corrected.

Fresh Butter, fresh bread, pies and cake constantly on hand at Jefferies' Bakery. G. W. JEFFERIES.

In Brief, and to the Point.

Dyspepsia is dreadful. Disordered liver is misery. Indigestion is a foe to good nature. The human digestive apparatus is one of the most complicated and wonderful things to exist-ence. It is easily put out of order.

Greasy food, tough food, sloppy food, bad cookery, mental worry, late hours, irregular habits, and many other things which ought not to be, have made the American people a nation of dyspeptics.

But Green's August Flower has done a wonderful work in reforming this sad business and making the American people so healthy that they can enjoy their meals and be happy.

Remember:—No happiness without health. But Green's August Flower brings health and happiness to the dyspeptic. Ask your druggist for a bottle. Seventy-five cents.

Renews Her Youth.

Mrs. Phoebe Chesley, Peterson, Clay Co, Iowa, tells the following remarkable story, the truth of which is vouched for by the residents of the town: "I am 75 years old, have been troubled with kidney complaint and lameness for many years; could not dress myself without help. Now I am free from all pain and soreness, and am able to do all my own housework. I owe my thanks to Electric Bitters for having renewed my youth, and removed completely all disease and pain." Try a bottle, only 50c. at Dr. G. W. Crouter's drug store. 4

Bucklen's Arnica Salve.

THE Best Salve in the world for cuts, Bruises, Sores, Ulcers, Salt Rheum, Fever Sores, Tetter Chapped Hands, Chilblains, Corns, and all Skin Eruptions, and positively cures Piles, or no pay required. THE JOURNAL
Charlevoix, Mich., Sept. 15, 1887.

Local Notes and News.

Are you going to the fair?

The office of the Newman house was repainted last week.

The leaves are taking on their autumn brilliancy of color.

☞ One heavy yoke of cattle for sale Inquire of A. Stewart.

☞ For ladies' and misses fall street jackets, go to B. See's.

☞ Buy your school supplies of Dr. Crouter, and save money.

Barnard Burns is erecting a house on his lot, on Dixon's addition.

☞ Write for particulars how to get the JOURNAL free for one year.

The schooner Lottie Mason unloaded grain at the Rifenburg mill, last Saturday.

Levi Blanchard's house on Main street has been repainted since last week.

Every farmer in the county should attend the fair at East Jordan next week.

☞ Dr. Crouter furnished five schools full outfits of Harpers books last year.

Running fires destroyed over twenty tons of first-class hay, for John Bell last Saturday.

How many Charlevoix merchants will make exhibits of their wares at the fair next week?

☞ Dr. Crouter is agent for Harper's school books and will furnish schools at introductory prices.

The announcement is made that the Charlevoix postoffice will be raised to third class October 1st.

A. T. Washburne & Co. say their new cloaks are in, and invite every lady in Charlevoix to call at once.

☞ Just received, at S. M See & Sons, a lot of kitchen tables, size of top 28x42 inches, selling at $1.50.

☞ Do not forget it: Dr. Crouter is selling school books for less money than any other dealer in the county.

The ladies' band has been reorganized, with Bert Jarvis as teacher, and expect to appear in public within a month.

Wm. Ranger and brother, have the job of brick work on D. C. Loveday's new two-story brick block, and begin this week.

District No. 9, Marion township, wants a school teacher. Apply to John Ward, director, Charlevoix postoffice.

☞ S. M. See & Sons haven new style hammock chair that is far ahead of any thing of the kind ever placed on the market.

☞ Just received an invoice of center tables and rocking chairs which we are selling very cheap, at S. M. See & Sons's.

Henry Barth, the boiler maker, is building a commodious looking cottage on the north side of Newman street near the resort ground.

Charlevoix wants another hotel fully as large as the Belvedere, to be ready for occupancy as soon as the railroad is completed. It would pay.

The indications are that there will be some interesting races at the fair next week, and Charlevoix horsemen propose to bring home some of the prizes.

The old propeller Van Raalte has been repaired so that it stood inspection, and is now running between South Haven and Chicago, in the fruit trade.

☞ Recollect our offer of the Weekly Detroit Free Press four months FREE to every subscriber who will pay four months (50 cents), or more in advance, in cash, for the JOURNAL.

☞ The property, known as the Sweetland Sanitarium, on the south upper terrace in the village of Charlevoix, is for sale or rent. Enquire of E. H. Green, Charlevoix, Michigan. 216 tf

☞ The balance of our jackets, newmarkets, and ladies' wraps will be here about the 15th, when we will show as fine a line as was ever brought to Charlevoix, all at popular prices.

B. SEE.

☞ LOST, one dark red OX, four years old, white on breast, large oddshaped head, broad horns with iron rod for knobs on, large leaf with iron rod for strap. A liberal reward if returned to John Hagerty, Hayes township.

If some of our draymen and baggage transfers don't stop racing their horses on the business streets, they will get themselves into serious trouble. On some occasions when a boat arrives it is positively dangerous for a pedestrian to attempt to cross the street. Such disgraceful conduct should be stopped at once.

Those business men who attend the adjourned meeting of the association tomorrow night will doubtless learn that delegate Kane was not idle during his trip to Flint. The business committee will find its hands full in a few weeks if all plans are agreed to.

The preliminary examination of pupils desiring to enter the 5th department of the village schools and who were not present at final exam ination in June, will be held at the hall on Saturday, Sept. 17th, instead of on Friday as previously announced.

During the county fair a pioneer association is to be organized. This is a step in the right direction. If care is taken in the selection of secretaries and historians, it will be a grand institution for gathering and perpetuating the history of the country.

One farmer living between two and three miles southwest of Petoskey has sold forty-three dollars worth of green corn off one acre of ground this season. This shows what can be done by active, industrious men who have the advantage of our resort markets. —Independent.

E. B. Hodge & Co. failed to secure the rooms agreed upon at Alba, and not finding any other suitable, concluded to continue the harness business in Charlevoix, and not move at all. They will hereafter be found in the rooms first door south of Sherwood's shoe store.

O. D. Hilton sends some fine specimens of fruit to the state fair, including in pears, the Flemish Beauty and in apples Steel Red, Alexander, Twenty ounce Pippin, Perry Russet, and Rosbury Russet. Mr. Hilton has made fruit growing a success, so far as quality is concerned.

If Capt Vanderhoef will buy or build two boats equal to the Friant and run them on the schedule adopted by the Friant and Cummings last spring, he will give Charlevoix a service that cannot be beaten. Van is reaping a harvest this fall, and we have no doubt he could handle two boats, with a satisfactory increase of profits.

The first fall meeting of the Charlevoix Teachers association will be held at the high school room, in Charlevoix, beginning on Friday evening, Sept. 30th and continuing until Oct. 1st. Some very interesting topics will be discussed. This will be the annual meeting and it is hoped that a large number of teachers will be present, to insure a good beginning for the year 1887-8. Program next week.

A new code of weather signals has been adopted. A yellow flag indicates a wind of more than usual severity but not sufficiently strong to be dangerous to vessels. The red and black flag indicates a severe storm. The red pennant indicates easterly winds; the white, westerly winds. When the red pennant is placed above the storm flag, it indicates wind from the N. E., when below the storm flag it indicates S. E. wind. The white pennant placed above the storm flag indicates N. W. wind; below S. W. wind.

It should be born in mind that one railroad to Charlevoix is not going to build a town or create any great boom. What we want are factories that will employ a large number of men during the entire year. And unless these factories are promoted, the railroad will do us but little good. Now is the time to encourage the building of manufacturing institutions. Factories are being built all over the state and we should not sit idly down and let other towns secure all of the prizes. We have an abundance of the best of material that should be manufactured here at home.

Charlevoix is in one respect in advance of Emmet County. The people of Charlevoix county recognize the value and great importance of developing their agricultural resources, and making the capabilities of their lands known, by means of an annual agricultural fair. After a year or two of struggle the East Jordan fair has grown into the proportions of a fair worth, and from all we can gather, the fair to be held there this month will far exceed that of last year in the number of exhibitors—the extent and variety of exhibits—and attendance. It will undoubtedly accomplish great good, and the general tendency is not only to stimulate farmers to more thorough and intelligent methods of farming their lands, but by a demonstration of the actual capacity of the soil in the production of crops to attract attention of farmers elsewhere and enhance the value of farming lands, by creating a demand for them. In Emmet county we are away behind our neighbors, Charlevoix and Cheboygan.—Record.

The September number of Home Knowledge contains: "The Cow-Pox Curse," by Felix M. Oswald, M. D., "Water and its Relations to Health," by J. F. McCann M. D. "Insanity," by Alexander Wilder, M. D., "Aids to Beauty," by Laura B. Starr. "Rest as a Curative Agent," by Geo. Covert M. D., and many other interesting subjects treated by eminent authors, including the "Editor's Table," which is several pages of notes and comments.

R. W. Kane returned Friday from the meeting of the Michigan State Business Men's Association. After addresses and reports of officers and committees, covering the principal features of business as now conducted, the association was re organized and incorporated under the laws of the state. Some of these reports and papers, already published in the Tradesman, are interesting and profitable reading. The citizens of Flint tendered the visiting delegates a drive about the city, and a banquet in the evening, all of which was thoroughly enjoyed. There should be a full attendance at the adjourned meeting of the Charlevoix association tomorrow evening, to listen to the report of secretary Kane.

The County Fair.

EAST JORDAN, Sept. 12.—The buildings and track are progressing finely, on the new fair grounds, and if the weather is favorable, the fair will be a greater success than ever before. The track is expected to be in good condition, being built on sand, and covered with clay; just one-half mile, with a home-stretch, level as a floor.

Floral hall is being built in the southeast corner of the grounds, in size 50x100 feet, and will be permanent. It will be lighted principally from the roof.

The cattle and horse sheds will be built in the northwest corner of the grounds, and will be good, comfortable quarters. The pens for sheep, swine, etc., will be near, and all stock sheds and pens will be convenient to the entrance gate.

The general entrance gate is well up toward floral hall. The secretary's office will be in floral hall, yet conveniently located to do business before entering the grounds.

The prospects are good. More inquiries for space have been received this year than previously, so that all that is now wanted, apparently, is good weather to make the third annual fair a great success.

Fruit for the State Fair.

L. D. Bartholomew, committeeman for Charlevoix, has collected a fine lot of fruit for exhibit at the state fair at Jackson next week. The following have already contributed, and others are expected to before tomorrow afternoon, when the lot is to be shipped: Charlevoix township, J. S. Dixon; Eveline, John Hammond, R. Hood, Marion, Wm. Black, John McNeil, S. H. Smith, Wm. Straw, W. D. Thompson, John Ward; Norwood, J. Bolton, O. D. Hilton, Park McIntire, W. F. Pearl.

J. H. Burnham of Eveline, sends a sample of corn for the state fair.

J. G. Reed, of Marion, sends a nice assortment of potatoes, corn, and cucumbers.

The Congregational church will have been organized five years next Sunday. The anniversary sermon will be preached by Rev. C. F. Van Auken.

Rev. C. F. VanAuken will preach an anniversary sermon at the Ironton Congregational church next Sunday evening at 7 o'clock, it being two years since the organization of the church.

The Diet of Strong Men.

The Roman soldiers, who built such wonderful roads and carried a weight of armor and luggage that would wrash the average farm-hand, lived on coarse brown bread and sour wine. They were temperate in diet and regular and constant in exercise. The Spanish peasant works every day and dances half the night, yet eats only his black bread, onion and watermelon. The Smyrna porter eats only a little fruit and some olives, yet he walks off with his load of 100 pound. The coolie, fed on rice, is more active and can endure more than the negro fed on fat meat. The heavy work of the world is not done by men who eat the greatest quantity. Moderation in diet seems to be the prerequisite of endurance. —Scientific American.

SPIRITS OF THE STORM.

[The following poem, from "Early Vanities," by N. J. Clodfelter, of Indiana, for beautiful imagery, close and powerful description, is preeminent, and some critics equal to any poem in the language.—ED.]

Roll, thunders, roll!
On the cold mist of the night,
As I watch the streaming light,
Gleid, blinking in the south,
Like a mighty serpent's mouth
Spitting fire.
Peal on, peal on, thunder's crashing,
And the streaming lightning's flashing,
Like great steeds coming over us,
Dashing to the distant course,
In there rio,
Swing fire,
From the wild sky higher, higher,
Till the mighty thunder mutter
Of a great astral moan,
Deafens cloud-built ships asunder,
As the distant coming thunder
Rolls, rolls, roll,
And shakes the grail earth to the poles.

Roll, thunders, roll!
You wake my drowsing soul,
To see the war in rage before me,
And the dreadful scene o'er me,
Lightning,
Brightening,
Passing,
Dashing;
Thunders locating in the distance,
Till the earth seems in resistance
To the navies sailing higher, fire,
O'er the wild clouds frowning fire,
Thunders roll, and the storm-king comes
Beneath great skies where mighty arms
Hurl thunder-bolts, and heaven drums
Her awful roll of sad alarm
He stamps the clouds, and onward prances,
As from him the wild lightning glances,
By his aegis the world is shaken,
Thus he shows his power,
That laughing overtaken.
And he feeds upon its blasts
Shafts, as if he were hot grazing
Hops, paws the clouds beneath his form,
Then gallops o'er the racing storm;
Then, as the lightning's wake
Stamps wildly, leaves the leaden plane
Of the dull—sad—
Ole while the drapery of the clouds,
Wrapt his spirit as in shrouds
Our darting eyes
Imagine surprise
Dread
And trace the wandering course
Of heaven's fleecéd winged horse!

Roll, thunders, roll!
As lightnings in the aching scroll
Sweep, leaping from their flight
By their dashing fore of light
While old Neptune, all alone,
Is sitting on his mountain throne,
O'er the sea,
Sits, sits, sits lonely, he
Thrusts his trident to his side,
With such force that the great mountain
Opens a deep cavern wide
And bursts forth a living fountain
Sparkling with the silvery hue;
And the Nereids, fifty strong,
Sing the wild Neptunian song,
Like fairy wanderings
From Neptune's hands
Sally from the cavern wide,
Sailing o'er the gray cold rocks,
With their fairy rainbow locks
Down upon the water's brim,
Sailing, sailing, sailing, sailing
Till their taper fingers tips
Gently in the water dips;
Then beneath the raging sales
Neptune in his chariot flies
O'er the sea
With his trident in his hand,
Sailing, sailing, sailing
Fishes in his mercy
He calls to his daughters
To sink with the wild waters,
He calls, but they heed not his word!
They are sinking beneath
The sea, sinking beneath
But the tempests—they flee from their lord.
Fain he would follow them
In the whirlwinds of the storm,
Anything heals the way
Whatever the winds may blow,
Fain would follow them
As if she would herself serve,
And then she rides the southern wind
And hide her sisters fellow
And leave old Neptune far behind,
Lord of his mountain hollow—
To nurse his wrath
Till the storm is past
And come his fairy daughters—
These mountain elves
That feed themselves
From the lord of ocean's waters,
He grasped a trident in his hand
That mighty rose at his command
And wildly blew till the great ocean
Rolled in billows and motion
And winds blind were in vivid commotion,
Working through immensity,
Hid by an magic art control
And gather in a secret scrol
Till the storm-king called these daughters,
O'er the howling ocean
Till the storm-king thunders roll,
Giving orders to Neptune's soul
As he sees them dart through air,
Daughters fifty, all so fair,
Free from the lowlan Sea,
Sailing to be
Their destiny.

Roll, thunders, roll!
Till the many church-bells toll
Deep in unity,
Touched by the enchanting wand
Of inner sea and land
Who's author of sea and land
Alone knows each destiny
But these!
The fair-faced nymphs of air,
Metamorphosed from the Dorian sea,
O'er the waters,
Through the cloudy
Through the cloudy winds they flee,
Floor layer lamas
Floor over the storms
So swift and magic!
Thus ends the long streaming flashes
That on the winds of chance they bright,
They ride, and they ride
Through the cloudy coral domes,
And look in their dazzling light
Where deep-voiced thunder peals lower,
And the long-wested lightnings rear tower
Where the storm-king's chariot cloud, or Ride on on a thousand steeds
Where storm to its fullness is raging,
And all nature of war seems to be
The cloud-sphere is then more engaging
To him than a wild breaking sea.

But now the growling, rolling, grumbling,
Thunders, in a distance murmuring,
Rolling, rauter, dying, dying,
And the lightning dimmer flying,
O'er the dark cloud westward lying,
As the morning in her joy
Bursts forth like an ancient story,
The wide world of the morning light
On this dark cloud of the night,
To the spirit-form of heaven,
In a moment unrolled
In the mission of gold,
And quick as its birth
Hides the spirit of the storm
And rest their weary forms.

ONE MOONLIGHT NIGHT.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

The apple-orchards of Mr. Peck and Mr. Norris were adjacent to each other. Each comprised about thirty acres; and the fruit raised in them was not excelled in the country. These orchards, in fact, were models of promptly, and people interested in that pursuit came from considerable distances to inspect them. They were alike as to general appearance and number and varieties of trees. Their owners were alike in nothing, and resembled each other less in disposition than in anything else. This difference will be best illustrated by a conversation that occurred between them when they met in the road one pleasant October day.

"I think we are fortunate," said Mr. Peck, "in having so good a yield of fruit when the price is high."

"Indeed we are," said Mr Norris.

"And if it were not for one thing, I should be perfectly satisfied with apple-growing, taking an average of the season."

"Ah," said Mr. Norris, "what troubles you?"

"It is the thieving of the boys about here."

Mr. Norris looked amused.

"It is a great outrage," said Mr. Peck, making himself angry as he talked. "The little rascals understand perfectly well how it feel about it, for I have repeatedly requested to permit them to enter my orchard, even to pick up the wind-falls. But they care for that. I have lost a great deal of time setting up sights and watching for them with a shot-gun loaded with powder and salt. The impudent scamps!—how I'd like to put a charge into their legs! But they're too cunning for me, either I get asleep watching, or they come nights when I'm not up. They steal my apples, break down branches, and give me no end of vexation. Sometimes I've thought of selling out on account of them."

"They never trouble me at all," said Mr. Norris.

"Well, I declare! How do you manage?"

"Very simply. When a boy comes to me for apples I take him out into my orchard, fill his pockets, and send him away as happy as a lord.

Mr. Peck elevated his nose, and uttered a contemptuous exclamation.

"And I tell him," continued the other, "that he may always pick up apples from the ground to eat, but that he must not climb the trees. In this way I have preserved my orchard from injury, and kept on the very best of terms with the boys."

"So you allow the young pirates to levy tribute on you as the price of good conduct!"

Mr. Norris laughed as he replied:

"We look at this matter from very different positions, Mr. Peck. The value of all the fruit given away in this manner during a season is trifling, and it seems to me a very slight consideration to make for peace and exemption from damage. I believe most boys are naturally high-minded, when you can really get to their hearts, and I'd rather have them for my friends than my enemies—especially in apple times. And then I'm not ashamed to see that I used to be a boy myself, and that I have never quite got over it. Yes, I like to see the little fellows happy; and if a few apples now and then make them happy, why, I'm glad to do them, certainly I am not the man to refuse."

"All sentimental stuff, Mr. Norris. My apples are my own property; I don't choose to give them away, and I won't submit to being robbed of them stolen. I shall get a longer to have them stolen; and if that isn't work, I'll set a spring-gun."

"I'm very sorry you feel so on the subject. The law will not justify you in such extreme measures—surely not in using firearms or spring-guns."

"But I'll do it—I'll be hanged if I don't! And Mr. Peck had his wife emphatically over the backs of his unoffending horses and went on.

Mr. Peck was a man whose instinctive feelings would at times overbalance his judgment, and he now proceeded without delay to fulfill his threats. It is perhaps unnecessary to say that this story describing boys not as they ought to be, but as they were in the neighborhood where its scene is located. The apple crop was superb, and had been a poor one the year before. The situation is a satire upon the novel Tudor idea—the idea of the paternal monarchy, as Mr. Green has it—which involved a divinity in kingship and a right in the royal family to divide British monarchs were acclaimed by the voice of the people, and were, at a later date, when the elective King, Henry IV., rode to Westminster to accept the crown, set upon the throne by a decision by a Parliament. The divine right, in a sense better unknown, was the idea of the Tudors, and the royal life and death had become so important that the people were almost nothing, as surrounded by his court, but in an isolation indescribable, distributed from his last earthly repose to be shown to the people in proof that there was still a divinity in the royal body, and that the watchful partisans of the heirapparent must hold their hands awhile.—The Art Journal.

Giving a Parson Points.

A young man who recently graduated from an Eastern theological school went out to Murray, in the County of Lake, to take charge of a church. The largest gambling-hall in town was cleared for his accommodation on the first Sunday, one table on which Spanish monte was usually dealt being left for him to use as a desk. The large stock-register book was laid on this, which was supposed to represent the Bible. The whole town turned out and the young divine preached a powerful sermon. It was announced gambling, horse-rac.g, drinking, and profanity. That afternoon he was called on by a committee of leading citizens, one of whom said—

"Young man, it doesn't matter we'd like to talk over with you. I am the Chairman ov the Vigilance Committee."

"Is it possible?"

"Mighty possible, Captain; the smallest possible thing ye ever seed. Wot we come hain to say is that we don't approve o' your preachin'."

"I am very sorry to hear it."

"Yes, I reckon you are; how I can change it."

"Can't, hey? Well, I reckon you'll hev to. Ye've got to let up on hollerin' again gambling, and drinkin' and swearin', an' liker. Them things air all low-down here, an' air highly recommended by the leading citizens, an' the clergy has got 'er fall inter line. As a committee we moved up here to warn ye, an' taint our style to warn men twice.

"But, my dear sir what can I preach against—I must denounce something."

"What can ye preach agin? Well, I swan! Hain't there wickedness 'nough in this country thout goin outer yer way to jump onter sich things? Preach agin hoss stealing and jumping mining claims, ye course. Rip em up the back an' tramp on em. Then there's original sin—heh? Well, I reckon ye'll jest hev to let that slide. Ye can't hev yer make a good job."—Omaha Republican.

The Veil of the Lady of Melcoth.

The Church of Meixoti, Mexico, contains a remarkable veil of great antiquity. For nearly three centuries Spaniards were in the habit of vowing a jewel to the veil of Our Lady of Meixoti if they returned safely from a voyage to Spain, until in Maximilian's time the veil was literally covered with a value of about £40,000. Three German adventurers, after having had an expedition planned to carry away this veil as booty. They made their plans with great care lest the booty should be secured the veil, but in some way they were discovered, and a party of jealousers overtook them in a narrow pass, where two of them were killed, the other escaping under cover of darkness, leaving behind him, however, the precious veil, which was regained and restored to the altar, where it is more unjustly guarded than ever.

PENNSYLVANIA DEMOCRATS.

The State Convention at Allentown—Text of the Platform Adopted.

The Candidates for State Officers Nominated with Little Friction.

The Pennsylvania Democratic State Convention assembled at Allentown, on Wednesday, Aug. 31. Many distinguished Democrats were in attendance, including Congressman William L. Scott, ex-Gov. Curtin, Samuel J. Randall, and Congressman M. Singerly of the Philadelphia Record. Ex-Congressman George Post, of Susquehanna, was elected temporary Chairman by acclamation. In a short speech, in which he hastily reviewed the work of the party in the State, Chairman Post said that under President Cleveland the country had had an era of unexampled prosperity, and concluded as follows:

In some quarters there is an evident attempt to create the impression that Cleveland's fate is identical with that of Buchanan, but the two are not like war, and yet he has appointed in the last two years more private pension bills than were signed by Republican Presidents in the last twenty years. Cleveland's pensions are well and generally approved by the people, and yet he has signed more pension bills than were signed by Republicans in the last two years preceding pension bills than were signed by Republicans in the last twenty years. Cleveland's pensions are well and generally approved by the people, and yet he has signed more pension bills than were signed by Republicans in the last two years preceding the Dakota admission bill, which was calculated to add two Republican Senators to the party, and which was passed under the pressure of the Republican party. And the Pension Bureau, under Democrats, has never been more speedily than ever before, and over fifteen thousand more pensioners have been placed on the pension roll than for two years Democratic administration, and in the last twelve years of Republican rule.

Committees on Resolutions and on Permanent Organization were appointed, and Chairman Post, on the motion of Mr. Clifton, was chosen permanent Chairman of the convention, and upon assuming the duties of the post spoke as follows:

Democrats have reason to be proud of the Democratic party in times of peace and war. The Democratic party saved us from the disasters that this broad country would have to be overshadowed and ruined. What if we have had a Republican President? Would it be perfect? What if quitted Miles had a home with the Republican party? Would it be in the full possession of his faculties? Would he have declared that Guilford Miles's home should be a home for the poor, the distressed, the harass things of the century. The Democratic party is the party of the people. The President was here to protect them. When Republicans were in power, they had a million men in the field. Democrats never have had a President whose name is woven with the wire in the fence, who has given to secure this administration with moderation, and who has been accepted by all the people as a clean, pure, and honest Democratic President, and the respect of the people and the love of the country. Except the rebel flags, the rebel rags, we have not seen the rebel flag, and we pray it and that it floats over a united, happy, and prosperous country. I am happy to express my confidence in the Democratic party, and I am satisfied with his work on any of the management manner, and manage fresh expense to sectional passions. He is like a lion pleasure with the wise and the good. Who is there to accuse

FARM AND GARDEN.

A HOME MADE FRUIT DRYER ILLUSTRATED AND EXPLAINED.

Many Facts That Farmers Ought to Know—Flaxseed as a Food—Medicine for Pigs—Cow Mangers and Stalls of Novel Construction.

The cow manger represented in the first cut is the invention of a Wisconsin farmer and was described recently in a paper read before a Wisconsin farmers' institute; it was originally illustrated in The Prairie Farmer.

As will be seen by studying the cut, the idea is a somewhat novel one. In constructing the manger make a floor ten inches above the floor of the barn and two and a half feet wide. Make the front of the manger about five feet high with one foot upright boards placed twelve or fourteen inches apart.

This front should be two and one-half feet from the wall at the bottom and three and one-half feet at the top. Make the adjustable or inside rack so it will be a little higher than the manger when set on the bottom. It should be set in notches at the bottom and remain loose at the top, so it can play back and forth. A notched board is hinged to the middle of this adjustable rack at the top, so as to catch on the top of the manger and hold it back when pressed against the hay. A slanting board is placed behind the bottom of the rack, which causes all chaffy material in the fodder to slide out in the foot box, where it is eaten, and not scattered under the animal's feet. Grain can be fed on the manger floor in front of the adjustable rack. In filling the rack with hay the notched board is lifted up, allowing the adjustable rack to fall forward. When filled this partition is pressed back firmly against the hay.

FIG. 2—COW MANGER.

The new style manger illustrated in the second cut is described in Prairie Farmer as follows: The manger should slope well back, and should have a tred box at the bottom. The floor should slope one inch in six feet, and should be divided into stalls three feet wide, or wider for large cows.

The novel feature in this is the pole in thick part of the stall. It ought to be placed just far back enough so that the cow's hind feet are behind it while she is still or eating. This causes all droppings to fall behind the pole. When she wishes to lie down she will lower her head, step forward, and lie down in front of the pole, where she never becomes soiled with the manure. The stick or pole should be firmly fastened to the floor.

A Cheap Fruit Dryer.

The drying of fruits for market has grown into an important industry in many sections of the country and consequently there has been called into existence a large number of patent evaporators. The patent affairs are many of them quite perfect in their way, and afford a great convenience and saving of labor where large quantities of fruit are to be handled. Many farmers, however, dry only enough fruit for their own consumption, and can ill afford to purchase an evaporator for the purpose. This class of readers will be interested in the accompanying cut taken from The Prairie Agriculturist. The evaporator illustrated is described as follows by a correspondent who has successfully tested it:

Take a large hogshead and cut a small door at the bottom through which to put fuel in the stove. Also cut a round hole in the head of the hogshead directly across from the door for the stovepipe to go up through, also a square one in front of this and your evaporator is completed with very little outlay.

With this or a similar home made contrivance may be saved much of the fruit that annually goes to waste on every farm. In it may be dried apples, peaches and all the small fruits.

How to Make Prize Butter.

L. P. Hogg, Barnesville, O., tells in Rural New Yorker how he made the butter that gained a prize at the dairy show. He says:

My cattle are all Jerseys. I fed corn meal and clover hay, and gave them the run of short, young blue grass pasture from 9 a. m. to 4 p. m. I used the Cooley submerged process; cream was all raised and taken off in twelve hours and then stood twelve hours more to ripen, at the end of which time it was slightly acid. It was churned at a temperature of sixty-two degrees in a hand churn. No coloring was used. The buttermilk was drawn off and the butter washed in the granular form till the water ran out clear. The butter was salted at the rate of one-half ounce to the pound in the granular form in the churn. It was then taken out and stood twelve hours in stone jars and was then put on a Skinner butter worker, and worked just enough to cause the granules to adhere well together. Then it was packed in ash tubs holding thirty pounds each. Ashton salt was used.

The Number of Sheep in the World.

The number of sheep in the world is estimated as follows, according to late statistics:

South America	100,000,000
Australasia, including New Zealand	77,000,000
Europe	62,000,000
Asia	45,000,000
Africa	30,000,000
United States	45,000,000
Mexico	3,000,000
All other countries	5,000,000
Total	367,000,000

A average yield of wool in the United States is placed at about six pounds per head.

Flaxseed for Pigs.

Professor Stewart advocates flaxseed as a food medicine for pigs. Its oil is soothing to the stomach and intestines and is also rich in food for muscle and bone. He tells in Country Gentleman how to use it. Boil the flaxseed in six times its bulk of water till it forms a jelly; now mix a little of this jelly with wheat bran and you have an excellent food for growing a pig. This is also good food for the brood sow, promoting her yield of milk. If used in this way, one pound of boiled flaxseed is mixed with ten pounds of bran. Pigs very soon get a liking for the taste of flaxseed.

Convention of Nurserymen.

At the late annual meeting of the American Association of Nurserymen, Florists and Seedsmen, in Chicago, the name of the association was changed to American Nurserymen's association. The next meeting will be held at Detroit, Mich., in June, 1888. The following officers were elected: President, C. L. Watrous, Des Moines, Ia.; vice president, L. G. Bragg, Kalamazoo, Mich.; secretary, D. W. Scott, Galesia, Ills.; treasurer, A. R. Whitney, Franklin Grove, Ills.

Public Lands.

According to a recent estimate, there still remain unsurveyed 9,000,000 acres of public lands in Colorado, 12,000,000 in Arizona, nearly 30,000,000 in California, 49,000,000 in Dakota, 7,000,000 in Florida, 14,000,000 in Idaho, 7,000,000 in Montana, 41,000,000 in Utah and more than 20,000,000 in Washington Territory, aggregating 322,000,000 in the states and territories mentioned.

Facts Farmers Ought to Know.

Marketing the produce of the farm is half the battle.

Potatoes bedide in the grass family barley, wheat, oats, corn, rice, timothy, redtop, blue grass, orange grass, quackgrass, etc. Grass is the most valuable of forage plants, is not a grass, but a legume.

It is stated by one who claims to know that the farmers in the northwest who are making money are by no means confined to the "bonanza class." There are many instances in which a few acres, well tilled, give far better results than a larger farm receiving less attention and care.

An earthen floor is the best for poultry houses.

It is a great mistake to overfeed the neighboring home market and trust to the large towns only.

It is poor policy to use green ash tubs to pack butter in.

More attention than heretofore is being paid the clover crop in the northern states.

Good heavy farm horses sell well.

More cheese is being made this season than last year.

Sorghum is considered the best of all remedies for bee stings by Professor A. J. Cook.

Morning in Mexico City.

An early morning start brings us first to the flower market. Whole families seated about are busily engaged in arranging flowers of rare beauty and fragrance. The flower girls, with their olive complexions and brilliant eyes of jet, their white teeth, beautiful hair in long braids carelessly swung over well-rounded shoulders, with shirts gathered short to the unconcealed waist, nimbly ply their deftest fingers as so adroitly that they weave bouquets as it were by magic, the roses, the lilies and the forget-me-not dropping into their places and forming garlands and wreaths of endless variety. Then to the market square, near the palace, where a jabbering throng of lazy men and loosely dressed women, with robust voices, implore you to purchase almost every article of household necessity, including fruits and vegetables.

Water carriers, with their earthen jars slung over their heads, are passing to and fro, delivering the morning supply of water from house to house. The little burro, that tiny quadruped so necessary in Mexicans family yet awake, is goaded along by his master. The little fellows, in groups of a dozen or more, are loaded down with everything from a chicken to a stove. The slightest laxity on the part of his master and he stops short to nibble at the nearest thing at hand, be it an old hat or an ear of corn. The question was once asked, "Can a burro driver be a Christian?" the answer being, "He might if he tried very hard, but he would have to give up his cruel burros."—Mexico Cor. New York Post.

Odd Forms of Cure.

At a famous water cure some odd forms of cure are whey, buttermilk and strawberry. Whey is prescribed for affections of the chest, buttermilk for certain diseases of the stomach and strawberries to purify the blood. The buttermilk and strawberries are favorite remedies.—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

WHITE SLAVERY IN COLONIAL TIMES

Redemptioners or Term Slaves—Free Willers and Indentured Servants.

Many persons who consider themselves familiar with the history of this country are not aware that in the last century white men, women and children were held in bondage; that the colonial laws in favor of such servitude were as explicit and severe as were those in support of negro slavery. Such white persons having a personal service to individual masters were generally known as "term slaves," though their legal status was represented by the word "redemptioner."

Isaac Weld, Jr., in his book of travels in America, published in the last century, asserts that it was the custom of shipmasters at Rotterdam and the Hague towns to invigle the people on to their vessels, under promise of a free passage to America. On reaching the colonies announcement of the arrival of servants and laborers would be made, and persons in want of such would flock to the ships, and the poor Germans would be sold to the highest bidders, the captains pocketing the proceeds.

Redemptioners constituted in the early part of the Eighteenth century a peculiar feature of colonial society. They were recruited from among all manner of people in the Old World, and through this channel Europe emptied upon America not only the virtuous poor and oppressed of her population, but the vagrants, felons and the dregs of her communities. There was thus introduced among the first settlers a society that, in many places, was almost unleavened with a leaven of goodness. Among the redemptioners, however, were a fair proportion of sturdy souls, strong in purpose and energy, who appreciated the great opportunity created for them by this complete change of life and country. At the expiration of their term of service many, by thrift and industry, elevated themselves to respectable positions, and were absorbed in the general mass.

There were two kinds of redemptioners—"indented servants," who had bound themselves to their masters for a term of years previous to leaving the old country, and "free willers," who, being without money and desirous of emigrating, agreed with the captains of ships to allow themselves or their families to be sold on arrival for the captain's advantage, and thus repay cost of passage and other expenses. The former—indented servants—were often trapped into their engagements by corrupt agents at home, who persuaded them all under false promises of lucrative employment, and assurances of remunerative employment at expiration of service, which would insure a competent provision for the remainder of their days. The emigrant often discovered on arrival that the advantages to be obtained in America had been painted by the agents in much too alluring colors. Frequently their masters forced them to most rigid labor, and exercised an unnecessary severity.

The free willers suffered even worse treatment at the hands of shipmasters and agents. They were led to believe that on arrival in America their services would be eagerly solicited by persons who would gladly pay the cost of their passage, which being only 2½ the emigrants would soon be able to repay, and then secure their liberty and a free employment and prosperity that the new country offered to adventurers. Many were entered into thereby these deluded ones found themselves, that if, on arrival, they did not succeed within a certain number of days in securing employment at a fair remuneration, they were sold for a term of years to defray the charges for their passages. Also, the "free willers," with rare exceptions, had a rude awakening on reaching the colonies. Under their agreements the captains had a legal lien on the persons of the emigrants until the ship charges were paid, consequently they were not allowed to go on shore, but were exposed to view on deck to the people who came down in search of servants. Except in cases of extraordinary qualifications, the fate of them were happy enough to make their own situations, and they frequently remained sold for several years of toilsome labor and servitude.

The usual period served in Pennsylvania for three years' service was £21 1s. 6d. When his time had expired a man was entitled to receive two suits of clothes, a grubbing hoe, a weeding hoe and a new ax. Children sold for from £16 to £18, and their masters were required to see that they were taught to read and write, and had at least one quarter's schooling.

In New Jersey—according to "Leander and Spice"—no white servant, if sold or found after 17 years of age, could serve above four years. If under that age, they were to be free on reaching their majority. At the expiration of service their masters were obliged to supply them with two good suits of clothing, suitable for a servant, one good falling ax, one good hoe and seven bushels of Indian corn. A servant was to be immediately free on proof of being so abused by master or mistress as to result in the loss of an eye or a tooth. The laws against selling redemptionists to escape were very severe. A fine of £3 was imposed for offering assistance in such cases, and the aider and abettor was obliged to make full satisfaction to master or mistress, the all loss, damage or cost sustained by the absence of or search for the runaway. Any one who concealed or entertained an absconding redemptioner could be fined at the discretion of the court, and made to pay ten shillings to the owner for each day he had harbored the servant.

In looking back on the peculiarities, changes, and gradations of society in New Jersey's colonial days, it is curious to note how the well to do emigrants who brought with them or purchased after arrival redemption servants, often lost the prestige of their affluence; being unable in the new country to maintain their rank influence. Their humble servitors, however, inured by hardship and labor to the stern necessities of colonial existence, prospered and throve. The humble people, after serving their term, acquired land and homes by diligence and saving; it was not uncommon, in the second generation, to find them taking precedence of the children of the master who had owned their time during their first years in the country. The affluent immigrant, having been accustomed to ease, proved unequal to the struggle, and his children, through faulty and ignoble education, rapidly deteriorated.—Chicago Times

REPORTS ON THE CROPS.

Large Reductions in Corn and Potatoes in the West.

The statistical report of the Department of Agriculture for September, says a Washington dispatch, presents a heavy reduction in the condition of corn and potatoes, with little change in the status of wheat and other small grains. In the spring wheat region Dakota returns 93, a small gain; Minnesota and Wisconsin, 72; Iowa, 71, and Nebraska, 76, a slight reduction from last month. The increase in acreage will make the difference still less between the present crop and that of 1886. The average for rye is 82; that of oats, 83.4, against 85.6 last month, showing a slight decline. The average for barley is 83, against 86.2 last month. A reduction in buckwheat has occurred, from 90 last month to 89. The average of condition for potatoes is very much reduced—from 83 last month to 67.3. This is four points lower than in 1881, and the lowest record for September that the department has ever recorded. The reduction is mainly in the West. The Michigan average is 90; that of Illinois, 87; Indiana, 81; Ohio, 84; Iowa, 57; Missouri, 77; Kansas, 61; Nebraska, 68.

WRAPPED BY WHITE-CAPS.

Another Outrage by Indiana Knkluxers.

A NEW ALBANY (Ind.) special says:

James Wilson has reached the city with a couple of black eyes, defaced nose, and several gharly cuts on his side, presumably a most intensive spectacle. The old man is from Crawford County, where he has just under gone a fierce rub with the "regulators," who formerly made Leavenworth their home. The charge against him is that he had sold his young son who expressed a determination to join the "White-Caps" against the father's protestations. The son made the fatal journey to Leavenworth. A meeting in a secluded place, section was held, and the same night the "White-Caps" visited the home of Wilson. He was overpowered and dragged to the wagon, lashed to a tree, and switched. After being released he was in front of him a heavy hickory club, which he seized, and with telling effect laid two of his assailants to the ground unconscious. Here, he says, is where he received the injuries.

SIXTY PERSONS HURT.

The Floor of a Church Gives Way Under a Crowd at Needmore, Tenn.

A NASHVILLE dispatch reports that the rear end of the upper floor of a two-story church building at Needmore, three miles from Mascoper, Iowa, gave way during a revival meeting, and sixty or seventy people fell with it thirteen feet. Hardly one of them escaped injury. The injured were quickly rescued from the wreck, and three of them were found to be seriously injured. One man was fatally hurt. Every physician in the county was immediately sent for, and the work of relieving the injured promptly began.

The Green Diamond.

THE race for the championship of the League is becoming decidedly interesting, as will be seen by the appended record of the eight contending clubs:

Clubs.	Won.	Lost.	Percentage.
Detroit	67	27	.713
Chicago	61	35	.636
Philadelphia	59	45	.567
New York	59	45	.567
Boston	55	45	.550
Pittsburgh	49	55	.471
Washington	38	65	.369
Indianapolis	32	73	.305

St. Louis still maintains a long lead in the American Association pennant race. The following shows the record of won and lost games:

Clubs.	Won.	Lost.	Percentage.
St. Louis	76	29	.640
Baltimore	65	40	.619
Louisville	62	46	.574
Athletic	62	49	.558
Cincinnati	50	60	.455
Cleveland	49	62	.441
Brooklyn	47	64	.423

THE creation express, on the Kansas City, St. Joe and Council Bluffs Railroad, ran into a local passenger train which was standing on the main line near Atlen, Iowa, killing five persons and wounding about twenty more. It is said the accident was due to the carelessness of the conductor on the local. The injured and wounded were taken to Council Bluffs. The list of injured was chiefly confined to the sleeper on the rear end of the passenger train, as follows:

Infant child of the Rev. A. E. Mosier, Creston.

Mrs Mosher, head and arms badly cut; will probably die.

Charles Cook, Brooklyn, N. Y., with side and shoulder injured; will probably die.

W. Ste. Clamond, age 1 year, old, was fearfully scalded, probably fatally. Other members of family not seriously hurt.

L. J. Gray, Greenfield, Iowa, horribly cut.

J. Fullerton, Chilhedar, Wis., arms injured.

Sarah Grimmiger, Cleveland, scalded.

Miss Anna Morrell, Red oak, Iowa, face and arms scalded.

J. A. Bailey and wife, Michigan, both injured in neck and slightly scalded.

J. Hickman and wife, Michigan, slightly scalded.

The injured are cared for at the Summit House, Council Bluffs, and are doing as well as could be expected.

A SIOUX CITY (Iowa) special says: "A jury has finally been impaneled in the Haddock murder case, in which Fred Mundrach, Jr., is defendant. Something over fifty men were examined before the panel was filled. The State and defense exhausted all their peremptory challenges. The personnel of the jury is as follows: One druggist, one merchant, two undertakers, one gardener and seven farmers. The jury is considered much better than the one which tried John Arensdorf, and it is believed that a verdict will be rendered in accordance with the evidence, though some think the jury will hang in any event. The defendant looks haggard and careworn, and it is thought that before the trial is over he will tell what he knows and place the crime on the right man. He was made somewhat of a scapegoat at the Arensdorf trial. There is little question but he knows of the incidents leading to the murder and was near the scene of the tragedy when it occurred."

THE Illinois Supreme Court has not yet announced its decision in the case of the condemned Chicago anarchists, says a Chicago special. There are rumors to the effect that the whole matter will go over to the spring term.

AT New Hampton, Iowa, two boys under 10 years of age are under arrest charged with attempting to wreck a train. The examples of youthful depravity say their intention was to rob the dead and injured passengers, and admitted they read with avidity "yellow-back" literature.

CLEVELAND celebrated Friday the thirty-seventh anniversary of its admission to the Union.

THE SOUTHERN STATES.

MR. MILLS, of Texas, who will probably succeed Morrison as Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, is in favor of placing Randall with the Republican minority on reports and engages to be a Democrat for the future.

THE Republican State Convention of Massachusetts is called to meet at Tremont Temple, Boston, Sept. 26.

THE famous Glenn bill was shelved in the Georgia Legislature, but a resolution was passed against the condonation of the races, and re-filing on the Governor to refuse to draw a warrant for the Atlanta University until he is assured that it will be used exclusively for the education of colored children.

THE Kentucky Furniture Company of Louisville, made an assignment with liabilities to the amount of $70,000.

A CHARLESTON dispatch says that ex-Gov William Aiken died at his country place at Flat Rock, S C., aged 81. He was Governor of South Carolina in 1844 and a Congressman from 1851 to 1857. He was the largest stockholder in the State before the war and was a prominent cotton planter. He consistently opposed nullification and secession, and took no part in politics after leaving Congress.

LATIN, GOLDSMITH & CO., liquor and tobacco wholesalers at Louisville, have failed for $100,000, their nominal assets being $30,000.

THE POLITICAL FIELD.

WASHBURNE dispatches say that Speaker Carlisle and Secretary Fairchild were in consultation with the President Tuesday, at the latter's country residence. The consultation was held, it is said, for the purpose of devising plans for the reduction of the Treasury surplus, preparatory to a reduction of taxes that produce the surplus.

THE vote stands to the number of 925 attended the Massachusetts Prohibition State Convention at Worcester. A telegram was sent to Neal Dow, giving the number present and saying: "Cheer up, old man, your children are growing to a mighty height." The convention made the following nominations:

For Governor, W. H. Earle of Worcester; for Lieutenant Governor, Jay Ward of Lowell; for Secretary of State, Henry A. Jones of Hyde Park; for Auditor, Charles H. Allen of Nantucket; for Attorney General, Allen Griffin of Nantucket; for Auditor, E. N. Stowe.

The platform accuses the liquor men of bribing Legislatures and murdering the opponents; declaring against licensing and local options; insists on the necessity of a third party; declares that the Democratic party makes no pretensions in the direction of prohibition, and that the Republican party does nothing else, and, in conclusion, it demands the immediate repeal of all license laws and the submission of a constitutional prohibition amendment to the people. The committee reported a plank demanding the ballot for women. This created the only exciting episode of the day, and after a hot discussion, and in order to compromise with the anti-woman suffragists, the plank was modified to the extent that the Legislature should submit the question of municipal suffrage to women.

THE State Convention of the Union Labor and Greenback party of Pennsylvania was held at Williamsport. The platform of the Union Labor party adopted at Cincinnati in February last was unanimously adopted, as was also a resolution demanding the ballot utter disregard by corporations of the provisions of the State Constitution. Charles S. Keyser, of Philadelphia, was nominated for Supreme Court Judge, and H. L. Bunker, of Hollidaysburg, for Congressman-at-Large.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSIONER OBERLY has sent, in response to an inquiry from Chairman N. Rowland, Chairman of the Civil Service Board of Examiners at Cincinnati, a communication in favor of the Board of Commission respecting the right of a postmaster to remove carriers and clerks, except for cause named in the civil service law.

THE twenty-one men who, the Committee says, "in the Cincinnati Postoffice might be legally removed for cause in a proceeding which you need no information, it is, therefore, unnecessary to give the reasons which in the opinion of the Commission, efficient carriers and clerks in the postoffice should not be removed for political reasons." The Commission does not agree in politics with the postmaster, but, "if the law is understood and is to be enforced, it seems that the power of removal is restricted, except that a reason should be legally made for any one of the following causes: Incompetency, disloyalty to the United States, or conviction of a felony or of a political purpose. Because a person has refused to pay money, or has refused to work for the political purposes of his superiors, or because a person has refused to permit the appointing officer or other superior to do his political work, are not causes which will justify the removal of a person in the civil service may be removed for cause, and the Commission is satisfied that if the causes named can not, under any provision of the civil service law, be made protection. The law fairly construed, they say, is sufficient to protect all persons in the service who shall be in the merit of the applicant without regard to his political opinions or affiliations and that continuance in the service shall be upon the employee's merit, without regard to his political opinions or affiliations. Therefore, to imperatively enforce the removal of a subordinate officer who does not contain political opinions violates the law, and an appointing officer who insists on this violation because the employee refuses to render political service, or because he refuses to pay to the appointing officer because he refuses to pay political partisan of the appointing officer also violates the law."

THE INDUSTRIAL REALM.

A CHICAGO dispatch of Tuesday says: "The big labor parade yesterday was one of the most successful ever held in the city. It was about as successful as plenty of people, plenty of brass bands, plenty of flags and banners and rounds and plenty of sunshine combined make it. Every sidewalk along the line of march was completely jammed with spectators, and in the business district every window and housetop was crowded. The approximate length of the line was three miles and a quarter. There were over 15,000 men in line, and the parade was witnessed by over a quarter of a million people. There were no red flags displayed. The assembly was made up of representatives of the various trades and labor organizations, and the parade was a good-natured affair, and it was believed that the absence from the parade of any of the anarchistic elements in the labor movement, at least, in this city 150 alleged anarchists closely shadowed by as many detectives in the employ of the city government; but such is the truth, and the statement is made on the strength of information received directly from the detective department of the city police. "We have received more information about anarchists during the past three weeks," said the official, "than during the three years past. What is being done in view of the Supreme Court decision? All that is necessary, and that means a good deal. This reply to the reporter's interrogatory was the same as that received from Superintendent Ebersold to a similar question.

"Is Judge Gary's residence being watched?"

"Yes."

"Are any of the jurymen who condemned the anarchists receiving police protection?"

"Yes; four of them on their own application."

"Are any of the principal witnesses for the State receiving police care?"

"Yes; four of them on their own application. Twenty-one in one of them. The others cannot be named."

"How about Mr. Grinnell?"

"He is not receiving anything, but if you go down to Aldine Square at suspicious hours of the night you may find a pair of boots outside of his door."

"Have you received any specific information from the parties who requested police protection?"

"All that is done in this line is for the chief to know."

"How many of the Reds are being shadowed?"

"At least one hundred and fifty."

"Are the anarchists more quiet now?"

The official would make no direct reply, but intimated that one of the most dangerous men, who fired on Rice street, had held a secret council with a few of the most turbulent of the inner circle but a few days ago, and that such attendant upon that secret meeting was just now the object of special attention.

"I am satisfied," said the official, "that the fellow on Rice street has had dynamite in his house within a month, but he has removed it, and I am of the opinion that he will not exactly fire at but fling it in headquarters with those who are manipulating it."

"Then you really expect or fear trouble in the event of an adverse decision in the anarchist cases in the Supreme Court, do you?"

"We don't fear it, but we expect it, and are prepared for it."

"Who are the leaders?"

"I cannot tell you, except that they do not reside in the city. I am satisfied that the actors in the Haymarket massacre were paid tools. The leaders are not in the East. It is the same now. The old Chicago anarchists have disappeared from the city, and have a few strangers in town, and we know the men they are trying to objects of the city detective force."

"What is the prospective decision by the Supreme Court will there be trouble?"

"Trouble is expected, but if, as any rate, preparations have been made to take care of it, and we are prepared to meet the worst, whatever that may be."

"Do you think that there are any bombs now in the city?"

"Well, I can't say, but we haven't seen them yet. It will not be a hard matter to lay our hands on them at the proper time. I will tell you this: The Reds are up to mischief, I tell you, I tell you, I tell you."

"Do you think that the anarchists intend to make a demonstration on the anniversary of their execution?"

"Well, I don't know

THE JOURNAL

CHAS. J. GRIER, EDITOR.

CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

THE Supreme court of Illinois, has affirmed the decision of the lower court, in the case of the seven Chicago anarchists, who were convicted in August 1886, and November 11th is fixed for their execution.

THERE were one hundred and twenty-six victims of the Chatsworth horror. One hundred and twenty-six years in the penetentiary, divided equitably among the management of the road would be about the right thing.

THE Boston Transcript, a republican paper observes: This soldier-bounty business—miscalled pension, for a pension is what is bargained for, so to speak, at the time of enlistment—to which a certain class of republican politicians are audaciously committing the party, was very distastful to General Grant, as to most real soldiers. President Grant refused to affix his signature to the bounty bill of 1875, rushed through both houses by overwhelming majorities, which was the fore runner of the now pending "dependent pension bill" and all similar demagogic bills for the soldier vote.

Special post-office inspectors have examined all the second and third class post offices in the United States and have returned to Washington where they are preparing a report to submit to postmaster-general Vilas when he gets back from his vacation. It is proposed to re-classify the post offices in regard to allowances for clerk hire, rent and fuel. As it is now, a postmaster whose receipts entitle him to a salary of $1,800 or less must pay all of these expenses, whereas, the postmaster with $2,000 salary has that much for himself, and the government pays the expenses. The injustice of this is manifest, and it is hoped will be remedied, after this inspection report is submitted and acted upon.—Democrat.

THE reclamation of 258,000 acres of "indemnity lands in the northern peninsula of Michigan, and the opening of these lands for settlement, is evidence that the government does not intend to let the late decision of Secretary Lamar concerning lands of that character become a mere lifeless form of words. In the case in question about two thousand farms are opened for actual settlement. The quantity of land is small, it is true, in comparison with the huge areas heretofore given to railroads, but the government domain left for homesteads has been so reduced by the monstrous land-grant system that every square mile now saved is important. The policy of the administration in this matter will receive, as it deserves, cordial support and commendation from the people of the western states and territories, since it will facilitate the settlement of their vacant lands, so much of which has long been held beyond reach under railroad claims, and directly tend to increase their prosperity. This policy is diametrically opposed to that which has prevailed nearly all the time in the last twenty-five years. Its advent is a trifle late, since only some small fragments of the once magnificent patrimony of the people can be rescued by it, but that is not the fault of the present administration, or of those who placed it in power. All that is left after nearly a generation of reckless waste and conscienceless extravagance will, if possible, be reclaimed and held for the public. In the attainment of that and the interior department seems determined to exert its utmost authority.—Chicago Times.

Pension Bills.

The Saginaw Evening Journal makes this dispassionate statement of facts relative to President Cleveland's record on pension legislation:

There were 485 private pension bills passed during the eight years of Grant's presidency, and he approved all of them. There were 303 private pension bills passed during Hayes presidency, and he approved every one. There were 736 private pension bills during Arthur's presidency, and he approved every one. There have been 1,021 private pension bills passed so far during president Cleveland's presidency, and he has vetoed 158 of them. No one of the president's named, vetoed a pension bill except President Cleveland.

As to the general bills signed by President Cleveland the same is true. Neither Grant, Hayes nor Arthur ever vetoed a public pension bill. President Cleveland did. That is the record as to pension legislation, public and private. The fact that Cleveland has vetoed a few pension bills seems to be laid up against him as a serious offense. It would be strange indeed if in all the thousand applications there were not at least a few undeserving and unprincipled persons who had made applications which should be rejected, and we believe that, if examined into, it would be found that all the above named precedents were more or less imposed upon by persons seeking to rob the deserving soldiers of the provisions made for them by a wise and grateful government.

Immigration.

Undoubtedly one of the greatest dangers which menace the future of our republic is the rapid increase of immigration from the south of Europe, particularly from Hungary, Romania and Italy. Most of the newcomers have very little money on arriving at New York, and very little desire to work; and what is still worse, they evince a fondness for city life which bodes no good to our social systems. If they would go out into the country and become primary producers, like the thousands of Irish, Scotch and Germans who used to come over forty years ago, we could stand them a good deal better. From 1840 to 1850 two thirds of the immigration into New York was Irish and German. These assimilated very rapidly with the native element and soon became part and parcel of the country. The fathers went on new, and uncultivated farms and made themselves therefrom good farms and permanant homes. While the young men did the same, or learned useful trades, so that they were soon self-improving, and the second generation was much better citizens than the first, and were a benefit to the states, as they were loyal to the government and considered themselves Americans.

Michigan Mention

The agricultural society of Grand Traverse county have decided to not have any horse racing at the fair this year. They propose to give other departments the entire attention.

Judge-elect Chas. D. Long, of Flint has been named by the governor as Michigan's representative at the Philadelphia centennial constitutional convention, vice Judge Campbell, who declined the honor.

Elk Rapids is all torn up over the statement that a confidential clerk in the employ of Dexter & Noble has been caught stealing money. The story is seemingly true, but very hard to believe.

A farmer from over Charlevoix way was in town last Friday with a load of apples which he found no trouble in disposing of at good prices. He wouldn't glut the market if he came over every week.—Otsego County Herald.

Reports from southern Michigan are that potatoes will very probably be numbered among the luxuries next winter. The high price which the principal articles of food command at this season of the year is not a pleasant thing for laborers with small wages to contemplate, with a six months' winter closely approaching.

John Dodd assisted by the tug Martin and vessel Sea Gem succeeded in raising the boiler of the City of Boston. They have already placed it upon the Furnace dock, and will commence to-morrow to raise the engine. The boiler has been under water for thirteen years and is now pronounced as safe as when first sank. The Frankfort Lumber Co. is having the work done at an expense of $2,500.—Frankfort Times

Fruit at the State Fair.

A dispatch to the Detroit Free Press, dated the 19th says: The horticultural department is perhaps the best ever seen in the state. It is under the supervision of C. W. Garfield, secretary of the state society, and is one of the most interesting sights on the grounds. Besides the exhibits from the state are many from outside, noticable among which T. S. Hubbard & Co., of Fredonia N. Y., make the largest display of grapes ever seen in this county exhibited by one firm, 160 varieties. The Eaton county horticultural society exhibits 115 varieties of fruit. Twenty varieties of Russian apples are shown by A. G. Tuttle, Baraboo, Wis. The Midland county agricultural society shows twenty-five varieties of apples, and Charlevoix county sixty varieties of fruit. Neil Munroe, of Elk Rapids, who captured more prizes at the New Orleans exposition than any other Michigan man, has over fifty varieties of apples. The display of fruits is arranged around the sides of the building and lengthwise through the center.

AROUND THE COUNTY.

Eveline.

IRONTON, Sept. 20.—Sunday was a warm and pleasant day.

Amos Box, accompanied by his daughter and Mrs. Edwin Winkler, left on Monday, on a visit to relatives in Canada.

John, Frank, and Miss Anna Morehouse, who have been residents of Ironton for the past few years, left the 19th for Florida, where they will make their future home. They leave many friends in Ironton and vicinity, who will miss them, but who will join us in wishing them success in their new house.

John Hayden and Mrs. Esther Allen, of this town, were married at Boyne, Friday, Sept. 16, by Rev. John Redpath. They have gone to keeping house on his farm near Advance. We join with their many friends in wishing them a happy life.

Miss Laura Jarman, who lost her trunk and satchel on her arrival at Petoskey from Ohio on the 13th of August, ascertained Tuesday of last week that it was at the Belvedere hotel at Charlevoix.

Partridges are numerous on the peninsula, and we frequently see large flocks of them.

The Ironton public school opened on Monday, with J. M. Harris as principal, and Miss Mattie O'Neil, of Charlevoix, primary.

Mr. Charles Peterson, of Petoskey, was in town last week, looking after his interests here. He contemplates getting out about 2,000 cords of wood this winter, beginning the first of next month.

Joseph Gayles, of this place, had the misfortune to lose one of his horses last week.

John G. Peterson, the enterprising merchant, has a new clerk, who arrived on the 9th, and will probably remain some time.

Rev. Mr. Tiger, of St. Ignace held services in the Congregational church last Sunday afternoon at 3:00 o'clock and Rev. C. F. Van Anken in the evening.

Chas. Timmons and wife have gone to Detroit.

Wilson.

EAST JORDAN, Sept. 21.—Beautiful autumn weather.

Thompson & Co. "threshed out" the Todd neighborhood last week.

Mrs. Geo. Durance and son of Charlevoix are visiting friends and relatives here.

Miss M. J. Johnson has so far recovered from her recent injuries as to be able to commence her school in the Slaughter district on Monday last.

Mrs. Dr. Harris and children, of Deloeta, are visiting relatives in the Wilks neighborhood.

The young folks' bible class and teacher of Bethel Sunday-school attended the Sunday-school picnic at Deer lake on Sept. 7th. They report a pleasant time. The banner inscribed "Joyful Gleaners" elicited much favorable comment.

Mr. Stephen Shepard and family and Jake Shepard visited relatives here on Sunday last.

Mr. S. Smith and Mrs. Davis of Advance were guests of Mr. and Mrs. F. L. Smith on Saturday last.

Mr. and Mrs. Sedgman of Advance visited Mr. and Mrs. Bowen on Sunday last.

On Wednesday occurs the 19th anniversary of the marriage of F. L. Smith and wife, Geo. Bowen and wife, and Mr. Stackus and wife.

Soldiers' Re-Union at Eastport.

Reported for the Journal.

Eastport remains integer, notwithstanding the raid the old soldiers made on us on the 14th inst. The citizens of Eastport had been warned of their intended raid, and was prepared to give them a warm reception. An address of welcome was delivered by Rev. H. S. Melon, pastor of the Baptist church of this place. There was but a small delegation of soldiers the first day, but on Thursday morning they commenced to come in squads. The citizens were also on hand with a large supply of ammunition, in the form of pork and beans, chicken pie, and other good things craved by the hungry soldier.

At about 9 o'clock the soldiers were ordered into line, and, led by the Eastport cornet band, marched to the grove where the feast was being prepared for them. The program at the grove included speeches by Rev. H. S. Melon of Eastport, J. J. McLaughlin of Elk Rapids, and Hon. Roswell Leavitt of Bellaire. After the address, the order was given to charge on the works. The charge was well made, and more good victuals were slain than ever before in Eastport in so short a time. The soldiers behaved grandly,—not one hung back or flinched in the least. After the wounded pans of beans, cake, pie, etc. were taken care of, Hon. H. B. Hudson of Mancelona delivered an address, showing why the association should be sustained.

The re-union next year is to be held at Mancelona.

H. B. Hudson was elected colonel for the ensuing year, and T. M. Crosby adjutant.

In the evening, at the camp-fire, a general good time was had, relating reminiscences of the war, etc.

When the time came to depart for home, all expressed themselves as well pleased with the exercises of the day, and glad they came.

Ellsworth.

ELLSWORTH, Sept. 20.—The farmers are passing here on their way to attend the fair at East Jordan.

We were much pleased today to meet Mrs. N. C. Conter of Northport who is visiting her sons at Atwood, and East Jordan.

The new bridge across the Intermediate, near Robert White's, will soon be completed, as they are now finishing the approaches. It will accomodate a great many people who have heretofore had to go a number of miles to cross the lake.

Dr. Crouter is agent for Harper's school books and will furnish schools at introductory prices.

Just received, at S. M See & Sons, a lot of kitchen tables, size of top 28x42 inches, selling at $1.50.

Do not forget it: Dr. Crouter is selling school books for less money than any other dealer in the county.

W. H. Francis has the contract for constructing a cottage for Prof. Jones of Ann Arbor, on the Charlevoix resort.

S. M. See & Sons haven new style hammock chair that is far ahead of any thing of the kind ever placed on the market.

The tug John Latham has been in the harbor several days this week, having a large scow repaired at Campbell's yard.

Just received an invoice of center tables and rocking chairs which we are selling very cheap, at S. M. See & Sons's.

W. A. Atchinson has a picture frame of his own make that is a wonderful piece of whittling. It was designed by Mr. Atchinson while in the army prison.

Mr. S. Parker is going into the egg and chicken business quite extensively, and for that purpose is building a poultry house 18x60 feet on the south end of his lot.

W. A. Brown expects to have a steam yacht built this winter, larger than the Beulah B., to be propelled by a coal-burner engine, larger and stronger than the Shipman.

Recolled out edition of the Weekly Detroit Free Press four months FREE to every subscriber who will pay four months (50 cents,) or more in advance, in cash, for the JOURNAL.

C. W. Dunham & Co., the East Jordan furniture dealers, have bought a handsome hearse. It was first used for A. F. Draper's baby. Charlevoix has had need of a good hearse this summer.

The property, known as the Sweeland Sanitarium, on the south upper terrace in the village of Charlevoix, is for sale or rent.—Enquire of E. H. Green, Charlevoix, Michigan. 216 tf.

The balance of our jackets, mewmarkets, and ladies' wraps will be here about the 15th, when we will show as fine a line as was ever brought to Charlevoix, all at popular prices.

B. SEE.

LOST, one dark red OX, four years old, white on breast, large odd-shaped head, broad horns with brass knobs on, large bell with iron rod for strap. A liberal reward if returned to John Hagerty, Hayes township.

L. D. Bartholomew has put a fine Emerson piano into the opera house, for the use of concert and opera company use. This will avoid the moving of so many pianos and organs, at great expense, and danger to the instruments.

Sportsmen who want to fill game bags, with the least possible expenditure of powder, will be interested in Charles Ledyard Norton's illustrated description of "A Pot Hunter's Paradise," to appear in The American Magazine for October.

Frank Sears is preparing to take the Shipman kerosene engine out of his yacht, and put in its place a larger and more powerful coal burner. With the added power he expects to turn a larger wheel and increase the speed of his boat.

While the barge L. C. Brittain, of Detroit, with a heavy cargo of lumber, was passing down the channel Monday afternoon, her rudder caught and parted the telephone cable. The lineman at Grand Rapids was telegraphed, and arrived Wednesday.

Mr. Wm. L. Curtis has a letter in the Petoskey Democrat, denying that he ever misrepresented Charlevoix in order to try to sell a piece of his own land. Nobody said he did; but from the amount of squirming and kicking one can easily believe that the particulars in the JOURNAL fit pretty close.

Mrs. Madison and Mrs. Hodge have put on sale the stock of millinery goods that they expected to open at Alba, but for which they failed to get suitable rooms. The stock will be found in the room two doors south of Stockman & Iddings hardware store and we understand that bargains will be offered until all are disposed of.

The Housekeeper for October will contain a full account of the wedding of the management of that paper, in the Minneapolis, Minn., exposition, on the evening of September 28, together with accurate descriptions and illustrations of the participants' wedding dresses and presents. A copy of this issue will be mailed free to any of our lady readers sending their address to The Buckeye Pub. Co., Minneapolis, Minn.

The overpresent D. S. Way, with his photo. outfit, made some instantaneous views of the stranded schooner L. B. Shepard, this morning, with two tugs trying to release her. And this reminds us that we neglected to mention last week a set of four views made of Lake Michigan during the gale two weeks ago. The waves dash high over the piers, and in the distance the entire surface of the lake seems covered with breakers. When there is an interesting picture to be had, Dan is always on hand.

Mrs. Henry Blakeley, of Eastport, was struck by lightning Tuesday, 13th. She was standing by the back door when the bolt came, and it struck her right shoulder, the electric fluid passing down her body to the ground, frightfully burning her shoulder, and slightly burning all the way down her back and leg. The lightning also tore a beech tree, slivering it and the peak of the house, and leaving that, tore the shingles partly off the wing. Mrs. Blakeley was thrown twenty feet from the door and gushed from her nose and mouth, and though somewhat dazed, is in a fair way to recover.—Elk Rapids Progress.

At the meeting of the business men's association last Friday evening, W. Kane reported the work of the state meeting at Flint, and gave the principal points of the papers read. He also outlined a plan for advertising this region, which had been discussed by the delegates from northern Michigan, and which it was hoped to put into successful operation this winter. It is proposed to call a meeting of representatives of associations to be held in Petoskey about the first of November, to complete the plans. All the papers read at the association are to be printed in the Michigan Tradesman, which our business men will find instructive reading.

The Holly Advertiser voices our sentiments when it says: "Send us news when anyone dies, gets married, runs away, steals anything, builds a house, makes a big sale, or whips his man—or wife—breaks his leg, gets his senses kicked out of him by a mule, or does anything that is in any way remarkable, and you have reason to believe that you know as much about the occurrence as anybody else. Don't wait for some other person to report it, or trust us to find it out by instinct, but come and tell us about it, or send us the facts on a postal card. In this way news is supplied, and it takes a good supply of that necessary article to make a good home paper. See if you cannot improve in this respect and let us know every item that transpires in your neighborhood."

What Kind of a Beef

It is reported that Miss Dell Hill and Miss Skidmore, of Boyne City, were out rowing a few nights ago, when a big bear swam out to their boat and evinced a desire to get into the boat. The girls canvassed the situation, and decid'd that they did not want to be hugged—by a bear—and they wildly pulled for the shore.

Coming Events.

Preaching at the Methodist church Sunday morning at 10:30. In the evening, at 7:00 o'clock. The bible reading Tuesday evening, and the prayer meeting Thursday evening should not be forgotten.

The County Fair.

The third annual fair of the Charlevoix Co. Agricultual Society opened at East Jordan, on Tuesday and so far as can be learned at this time has been a success. During the past summer a driving club was organized at East Jordan, which association purchased grounds about one half mile east of the village and built quite a substantial race track, put up buildings, and otherwise put the premises in a condition for use. The agricultural society having no grounds of its own, leased the grounds of the driving club. Upon these grounds have been built a floral hall, offices, and sheds and pens for stock. Floral hall is quite a commodious structure 50x100 feet, well ventilated and lighted, with an office in one side where business may be transacted from both inside and outside of the grounds, also with platforms and sielving for the exhibits. On the right of the entrance to the grounds which is midway on the north side, is the office of the general superintendent and treasurer. Just south of the entrance on the opposite side of the race track, is the judges' stand. To the right of the entrance are the stock sheds.

Tuesday, the first day, the attendance of course was small, and the weather was dry and dusty but many entries were made with the secretary of articles to be brought later.

Wednesday forenoon was rainy and until noon the prospect of a fair was very discouraging, yet the energy of the officers abated not in the least, but they kept right on making ready for a large crowd.

In spite of the threatening clouds and frequent showers the people began at an early hour to make ready for town. All the boats from Charlevoix took full loads. Before noon the elements put on a more cheerful appearance. The clouds cleared away and a pleasant afternoon was had. People had gathered in from all directions, so that a big crowd was in attendance.

The exhibit of fruit and vegetables was all that could be desired. About forty feet in floral hall was given to apples, plums, pears and grapes, and a collection of larger or more luscious looking fruit would be very hard to find. There were two hundred and eighteen plates of apples. Quite a large space was given to grain which was occupied by a very creditable exhibition of wheat, oats, beans and corn, which demonstrates beyond a doubt that the raising of that class of vegetables is a success in this climate.

The show of potatoes, onions, beets, cabbages, melons, squashes and pumpkins were also very satisfactory and among them is found the largest pumpkin that we have ever seen.

The poultry department showed a large number of species of chickens and ducks, evidencing that quite an interest is taken in the breeding of poultry, in the county, with satisfactory results.

A look at the cattle and horses showed that our farmers are interesting themselves in the improvement of the stock by breeding the better grades.

A very fair exhibit of agricultural implements, wagons, buggies, cutters, etc., are found upon the ground. Among them is C. W. Dunham & Co., new hearse, which is the finest in Northern Michigan.

Outside the agricultural department floral hall is well filled with mercantile exhibits, consisting of organs, sewing machines, wash machines, furniture, hardware, pictures, clothing, furnishing goods, and fancy work, neatly arranged in department.

Stockman & Iddings have a good selection of stoves, pumps, saws and general hardware, in charge of A. J. Stockman, who appeared perfectly happy while pointing out the merits of his wares.

The Rifenburg Milling Co. of Charlevoix, have a large quantity of their choice flour on exhibition in charge of Mr. Buttars, who was giving away generous samples to any desiring to test it.

The afternoon was spent in base ball and horse racing.

Charlevoix's home team went up to play East Jordan's team. Five innings were agreed upon, but as five innings resulted in a tie, six were played. The game resulted in favor of Charlevoix with the last inning unfinished for want of time—with two men on bases and only one man out. Geo. Sherwood and Fred W. Mayne were battery for Charlevoix. Umpire, Gurley Beak.

Score by innings:

Innings	1	2	3	4	5	6
Charlevoix	0	4	2	0	1	5
East Jordan	0	2	0	2	2	3

In the evening the Charlevoix Polo Club played at the rink with the East Jordan club, beating the East Jordan club by four to three.

To-day the weather being pleasant, a good attendance was had. The principal features of the day's program were the horse races.

All things considered, the fair may be considered a success. The gate receipts were something over six hundred dollars.

At a meeting of the society this afternoon, president Black was re-elected. The ballot for secretary was a tie between J. H. Stone and H. F. Barber. J. B. Palmiter was re-elected treasurer and William Mears, Boyne Falls; D. Harrington of Melrose, R. Jones and F. H. Ramsey, of South Arm, were elected directors.

Death of H. H. Vanornum.

The Journal announced last week that Mr. H. H. Vanornum, of Norwood township, had been stricken with paralysis, and that there was no hope of his recovery. On Monday night death ended his sufferings.

Mr. Vanornum was over 80 years old. Sixty years of his life was spent in the state of New York, and the last 20 in Norwood township, where he owned a farm of about 500 acres of the best land in this region, surrounded by most of the comforts of life, as the result of hard work and scrupulous economy.

He was a member of a Baptist church in early life, but of late years had not been active in church work beyond giving the use of his property toward church buildings and improvements. He was a charter member of Charlevoix lodge, No 282, F. & A. M., and he frequently gave expression to the belief that the order contained religion enough for him, if properly lived.

Politically he was an uncompromising democrat all his life, and aided in every possible manner the success of that party. He was one of the promoters of the JOURNAL, and helped to get this paper established in 1883.

He leaves a wife and seven children. The funeral services were held at the M. E. church, on Wednesday afternoon with Masonic honors. Rev. R. H. Whitman officiating, assisted by Rev. W. H. McCartney.

Purely Personal.

Rev. C. F. VanAnken is in Vanderbilt, this week.

A. O. Freeman, of the Detroit Safe Co., was in town Tuesday.

Mrs. S. K. Bagley has been quite sick during the past week.

Born—on Sept. 29th, to Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Fogg, a daughter.

Rev. J. T. Iddings left Tuesday for Reading, to enter upon his year's work.

S. M. See returned Tuesday on the Lawrence from his two-weeks visit in Wisconsin.

A. L. Conlter and Miss Jessie Heston of East Jordan, were married Tuesday evening.

C. W. Dunham and Miss Emma Glenn, of East Jordan, were married last Thursday evening.

Bert Jarvis and Aggie Miller were married last evening at the M. E. parsonage. May they live long and prosper.

Word was received today that Mr. P. K. Brown died at his old home in Potsdam, N. Y., Sunday evening, and was buried on Tuesday.

Meeting of the Teachers' Association.

The first meeting of Charlevoix Teachers' Association for the school year 1887-8 will be held at the high school room in Charlevoix, on Friday evening, Sept. 30th, and Saturday forenoon, Oct. 1st, the evening session beginning at 7:30 o'clock, and the morning session at 9:30. The exercises will include the annual address by the president, and a discussion of subjects as follows:

"The teacher's preparation: The child and the subject taught," by J. M. Harris, of Ironton.

"Some difficulties in Arithmetic," by Mrs. Delia Porter, of Charlevoix.

"Devices for incressing interest in certain subjects" by H. M. Enos.

"The teacher's work outside of the text book," general discussion.

The Question Box, for all.

This last feature of the association meetings has proved to be one of the most profitable of all, giving as it does an opportunity to bring up and briefly discuss any question that is especially desired by any teacher, and leading to a free informal exchange of sentiments.

The annual election of officers will be held on Saturday. An invitation is extended to all teachers and others interested in school work, to be present and help to make this a good meeting. The past year has proved the association to be worthy the support of every teacher in the county, and it is earnestly hoped that its sphere of usefulness is to be greatly extended during the current year.

On the Beach.

While trying to make the harbor last night without a tug, the schooner L. B. Shepard missed the channel and went on the beach a few rods south of the south pier. The tugs Campbell and Martin tried to release her, but so far have failed. She rests on smooth bottom.

Absorption of Disease by Porous Wood.

A celebrated physician has remarked that every house ought to be pulled down at the end of its sixtieth year, as it has by that time absorbed all the diseases of all those that have lived in it, believing that wood and plaster absorb gases, foul air and feverish exhalations as readily as milk or water does. But as it is not practicable to tear down houses every half century or so, it is to be considered if all the wood used in their interior construction, and all the plain surfaces of plaster should not be so thoroughly oiled or varnished that the power of absorption should be almost entirely destroyed, and the character thus so changed that destruction would no longer be desirable.—Harper's Bazar.

THE RAINBOW SERMON.

BY GEORGIA MILLARDE AMBRIDGE.

A shower came down and kissed the earth with
Its soft, caressing showers,
And every flower, thereath sage received its Sweetness rare,
The flowers and the meadow lands (dear) its
Sweetness rare,
And even the sun smiled through the trees, and made the scene more fair.

A mother and her little child stood (beath),
Spreading out
The child was wise with wonder as thus the Mother spoke:
"Look, beyond dear, cross yonder hill, toward
The sky, so blue,
Do you see the arch, that lovely arch of colors bold and true?

"See how it spans the washed skies and dips
Into the sea,
Then peeps from behind them way behind that grand and broad tree?
One day, 'tis said, a mariner came, from worlds
far off from ours,
And hid a pot of gold just where the rainbow touched the flowers.

"Some seek that mystic pot of gold until life's tide is ours,
And, failing, in their search, return, exhausted
quite at last,
And some, thank God! there are a few who read
it how aright,
See only in its varied hue a promise clear and bright.

"Long centuries ago, 'twas made by One who walked the sea,
And yet, 'tis new and fresh to-day, and comfort
to you and me,
Its mellow light spreads over the earth, and enters my sad heart,
Speaks promise to all my troubled thoughts, and waits to be or depart.

"It is a mystic messenger, prophetic, grand and true,
And there, if we read its answer aright, we words 'I leave,
And so if we who turn its leaves, will study
carefully,
We'll find the promise written, 'Little children
come to Me.'"

The Poor Young Man on the Top Floor.

NEARLY days of my life were uneventful. I was but one of the spotless, young men who traveled my companions and I spent our days in trying to be an autobiography. I will only re-late those incidents in which I played a star part. In the large, red, where my early life was spent, I saw Arabella, a young lady from New York, with an old gold-colored bang, and eyes as blue as wood-violets. She dressed as soberly as a Dominick hen, and all occupants of the barn were fond of her. Even the goose, who had a notorious bad temper, forgot to hiss when she patted its back.

Arabella was standing in the doorway one morning, with her new archery around her, when the tragedy occurred. The goose was so intent in looking at the fair young figure on the porch that she did not notice any impending danger. Nothing along the road on a bicycle came a young man attired in a neat-fitting corduroy suit. A unshorn, honest-looking young chap, he seemed to me, who took a sensible view of life, and who knew a pretty girl when he saw her.

He saw Arabella, and saw that she was fair; he did not see the goose, however. There was a collision, and in a moment the air seemed filled with gentleman's fleeting goods and with profanity. The goose, greatly disgusted, with ruffled feathers and a general appearance as if she had been boxing with a buzz-saw or delving into the intricacies of a sewage-machine, retired to recuperate under the hedge, and hissed the other actors in the play.

Arabella stepped long enough to take up a stitch she had dropped in her knitting and then went to the young man's assistance, like a brave little woman that she was.

She deftly dug the rich Jersey clay out of his eyes with her rosy fingers, and bathed his brow with eau-de-Cologne. He did not seem to object to this performance a bit, and I am inclined to think he rather exaggerated the result of his injuries. I know that at by the shady road long enough to have had a dozen arms set, and he didn't broken anything but his bicycle.

Well, I thought they never would say good-by; but at last, after taking about an hour to the operation, the young man disappeared over the hill trundling his bicycle, and Arabella went back to the house with a dreamy look in her eyes, and a new installment of freckles accumulated during the interview.

From that day the young man was often to be seen going by the house, and finally he began to stop at the gate; and it wasn't very long before they were practicing archery on the lawn.

The summer passed and the fall set in, but even in the bleak days of October they were always together, arm in arm, listening to the sighing of the wind, the rustling of the dry leaves, and the chirping of the birds, and all the while the young man was trying to warm himself over a grating in Printing House Square, caught a gust of ice drifting down by, and utter a chase finally captured me, to his great delight. It was nine o'clock before my little friend had disposed of all his papers and started for home. Our way led through the east end of the city, where the houses looked like wrecks stranded on the shores of a commercial sea; tottering tenements that overlooked blind alleys, with sight-less-looking windows filled with old hats and dingy newspapers. The room I entered was squalid enough; its walls reeking with filth, where grimy-faced children were enjoying some boisterous games. The family of my captor occupied a single room near the roof. There were seven in all; his father and mother, who had never known what it meant to all their worn and weary lives, three other boys, and the tiniest baby I ever laid eyes on. I was soon in the baby's dimpled fingers, and though a good deal crushed by the operation, I felt I was giving the poor little thing pleasure.

I was just making a survey of the room and its happy occupants—for they all seem to be happy in spite of their surroundings—when the door opened, and who should enter but Arabella! Yes, Arabella; and behind her strode a footman in livery, carrying a basket of pastry and groceries enough to last the family for a month. And how the newsboy yelled, and his mother laughed, and the baby crowed, when they found that all the good things were for them. I declare, I wished I could be a man to let Arabella just then and there for what she had done.

It would take me a long time to describe the pleasure that poor family experienced through her bounty, and how the table groaned with good things. They were all going to sit down to the first good meal they had enjoyed in weeks, when the newsboy suggested that they should send for the young man on the top floor, since they had so much and to spare. And no sooner said, then one of the youngest of the family had climbed up to the attic, and was soon pushing a reluctant young man into the room. It was another surprise for me, for I was soon engrossed with my old friend the bicycle rider.

I knew just how he felt. He was proud and he did not like to accept anything from these poor, honest people who had made him so welcome, and the appetizing smell of the dinner was so savory that before he exactly knew what to think, he was seated at the table and eating as he had not eaten since he left the country.

I found out, through the conversation at the table during the meal, that he was a poor author, and that the paper on which he had worked had suddenly failed, so that he was reduced to extreme want. He talked remarkably well for so young a man, and I grew very much interested in him.

Among other things, he said he had grown so discouraged of late that he had not written a line, but an idea for a poem had come to him as he walked about the streets that day, and he intended to begin it at once. After dinner was over he caught sight of me in the baby's hands. "Just the thing! I want to write my poem with, if the baby don't mind," he said with a laugh. "If you will lend it to me, perhaps it will bring me luck, and I shall soften the heart of some publisher." So he got me finally, and, after saying good-night to the honest people, went up to his attic, where he fashioned me into a pen, and wrote some very good and gained immortality by using.

For hours and hours that night I traveled diligently over the paper—though the young man was consider-ate enough to give me frequent rests while he ran his fingers through his hair to collect his thoughts. It was nearly morning before we stopped our work, and I was laid down alongside of the poem, which was beautifully written on a spotless piece of paper, all ready for the next operation.

In the morning my proprietor put me in his pocket, together with the completed manuscript, and then we did a great deal of walking until we came to a square filled with trees and benches. At the north end of this stood a high brick building, which I recognized by the sign as belonging to a very wealthy publishing house.

My proprietor, with a confident step, entered an elegant office in this building, and deposited the roll of his manuscript with a supercilious-looking clerk, who eyed him disdainfully as he stuck the package into a half-filled basket that lay on the desk. But my proprietor was too confident of success to mind this, and hummed a merry tune all the way home.

An old goose-quill I once met on the farm, and my only literary friend, was late the time the average magazine editor generally took one year to read a manuscript, one year to reject it, and about five years to publish it. I was therefore surprised to find, a few days afterward, that my captor had received a letter from the editor, inclosing a check accompanied by a very flattering note, and with a view to future contributions.

Our second visit was more pleasant than the first, and we soon found ourselves in the presence of the editor. I noticed my proprietor started when the great man of the magazine introduced himself; but, however, that night he I know we accepted the invitation to dine that evening at the editor's home with his family. THE HUDSON BAY COUNTRY.

Interesting Information About a Comparatively Unknown Land.

Letter in Pittsburgh Post.

Those who have never seen life as it exists among the inhabitants of the Hudson Bay country would be astonished at the extent of civilization among a class of people generally supposed to be savages, as well as at the awful grandeur of the scenery and forbidding aspect of the graveyard coasts along the shores of that northern sea.

All the wonderful scenery of North America there is nowhere to be found a more bleak, desolate, or dreary waste than that between Ungava Bay, off the coast of Labrador on the east, and Fort Churchill, on the west and southern part of Hudson Bay proper. Although little is known yet regarding this weird and frozen region, it has had a growth within the last half century which has been something phenomenal, and having been measured according to its kind, the village goes about from hut to hut and rings the bell in front of each until the occupants come out, more governess rule of original partnership than in usual among men of brain, though these latters earnings are on such a scale of plenty that unless we look below the surface requisites and equipments of the house we fail to discover the false financial relations that exist between husband and wife. For wives, as a class, have no spending money, and are rarely cognizant of their husband's true business condition. Is this just to the being a very wealthy publishing house.

My proprietor, with a confident step, entered an elegant office in this building, and deposited the roll of his manuscript with a supercilious-looking clerk, who eyed him disdainfully as he stuck the package into a half-filled basket that lay on the desk. But my proprietor was too confident of success to mind this, and hummed a merry tune all the way home.

FARM AND GARDEN.

THE CHAMPION SHEEP AND CATTLE DOGS OF THE WORLD.

A Very Convenient Little Implement. Interesting Items About the Trotting Wonders of the Country—How to Make A Vermin Proof Well.

The use of impure water is the cause of much sickness among farmers as well as among city folk. Generally speaking, farmers flatter themselves that the water in their wells is pure as is a dew drop, while in point of fact it often occurs that said water is absolutely polluted, in a word unhealthful. There are many causes of impurity, such as the close proximity of cesspools, duck puddles and the like. Another source of pollution is the burrowing beetles and worms, especially angle-worms, which enter the well through the chinks in the well, fall into the water and sink to the bottom, where they die and decay.

A VERMIN PROOF WELL.

These worm and bug invasions are liable to be in every well, and are, moreover, difficult to provide against. The pests cannot be excluded by an ordinary wall because the brick or stone cannot be laid sufficiently close to make it worm proof. The most effective way of keeping them out, according to a correspondent in New Yorker, is to lay the upper ten feet of the wall in cement, or to back it with the same material, as shown in the illustration. Backing, in this correspondent's opinion, is the safer and better plan. As the wall is being built it is set in an inch from the sides of the wall, and the space between them is carefully filled with cement. If this is well done, the wall will be absolutely worm and bug proof.

The finishing of the top is an important matter. It should be laid perfectly even and smooth, and covered with a close fitting platform of two inch plank. Near each end of this platform a two by four scantling is fastened, upon which a second platform of two inch plank is spiked. This is designed to shelter the lower platform from the sun, and thereby prevent it from shrinking, warping or splitting. It makes a perfectly safe platform, and one that will effectually prevent all kinds of bugs, worms and vermin from entering the well at the top.

Old wells, says the authority quoted from, may readily be rendered worm proof by having ten feet of the well taken out and backed with cement as above.

A Very Convenient Implement.

The simple implement shown in the cut is an exceedingly convenient affair, and will pay for itself many times over in one season, by greatly facilitating the operation of vine stalks, hops, pole and other long slender supports, otherwise difficult to set in the ground.

A CONVENIENT IMPLEMENT.

To a round rod of iron, one inch in diameter, weld on a sharp round point one foot long and two and one-half inches in diameter at the top of the point. Any blacksmith can furnish one at small cost when he gets the idea from the cut. When finished the implement might not to be over five feet long and will weigh about twenty pounds. By striking the down bolts the earth repeatedly with both hands and working it from side to side a little, so that it can be drawn out easily, a hole will soon be made deep enough to hold poles and stakes firmly without digging or driving.

The Scotch Collie.

The employment of the sagacious Scotch collie has largely increased in the United States during the past few years. It is as a sheep dog that the collie is best known in this country, but he is equally valuable as a careful watcher over herds of cattle. With the growing demand for this sheep and cattle dog it is well to make mention of the fact that collies vary in disposition and good qualities as well as in color, so care in making a selection it is wise to procure as perfect a specimen as possible. At an early age a well bred collie displays striking intelligence, and with proper training soon becomes proficient in the art of "gathering" and "dispersing" herds and flocks.

BEN NEVIS, THE CHAMPION COLLIE

The collie represents Ben Nevis, the well known collie of the Sons Scotland lodge in Philadelphia. He was bred in England, and has taken a number of prizes in this country, among which was the champion prize, won in Dallas, Texas, in 1885.

An Experiment in Cutting Wheat.

Experiments at the Ohio State university grounds made it appear that the practice of cutting wheat before it hardens reduces the quality. It is explained that the gluten is two or three days slower in forming than the starch, and, when cut in the milk stage, the amount of gluten is materially diminished. The grain may be plumper and the flour whiter, of this early cut wheat, but according to the experiments alluded to, it will be deficient in bread making qualities.

The Country's Clover Crop.

The acreage of clover, both for hay and seed, seems to be steadily increasing in almost every portion of the country. The area shows a marked advance in many states this season, especially west of the Mississippi river and in the south. The only sections showing a falling off are the middle states and the Ohio valley, where unpromising weather resulted in the freezing out of considerable areas.

Locating Walks and Drives.

When walks and drives are to be located these might to be placed only where they will be required for every day use, and as direct from one place to another as practicable—not necessarily straight, but on graceful sweeps and curves, which are much more pleasing to the eye. Let the ground be graded so as to slope away gradually from the house.

Squashes as a Second Crop.

Squashes are excellent as a second crop after spinach, onion sets, radishes, kale or lettuce. They are sometimes grown between the rows of early beans, peas, cabbages and potatoes. Every fourth row in the early crop is left vacant and the squash seed planted in these rows, and the early crop cleared away in July before the squashes begin to run.

Peach Trees.

A paragraph from an exchange says: Peach trees growing near the house where dish and wash water are thrown out, are long lived, free from worms, disease, etc. A bath can be had from this, showing that salt and alkali are what gives the result.

On the Country Road.

At Saratoga, N. Y., farmer reports that a large crows from pulling the corn by scattering a few quarts over the field for them to pick up, and repeating it if necessary. The crows eat enough grubs and cut worms to pay for the corn.

Five hundred and sixty-five acres of corn have been engaged of the Androscoggin county, Me., farmers by the two Auburn corn canning factories.

Prof. Robertson, of Canada, claims that cream raised by the deep cold process produces a butter that is less highly flavored when first made, and is, in fact, often insipid at that time, but its flavor increases with age, and is at its best when several weeks old.

New England farmers attribute the disease known as weak loins in hogs to lying in hot house manure. It is a rheumatic trouble, which may be cured by active and continued rubbing. It may also be cured by exercise and fresh air.

The farmers of Texas, Arkansas and Louisiana propose building cotton, cotton seed oil and flour mills at different centers in those states, the farmers to own said mills in common.

Potato growers in California are elated over the success of the plan of shipping potatoes to Chicago.

It is said that the government still owns 29,000,000 acres of unsurveyed land in Nevada.

Pyrethrum is not poisonous to vertebrate animals, but a little of the dust blown upon an insect of almost any kind is sure and speedy death.

Rural New Yorker recommends bahach or pyrethrum, in water, one tablespoonful to two gallons, as an excellent wash to keep flies from worrying work horses.

The freshest eggs are heaviest. Placed in a pan of water they sink; older eggs partly sink, and stale ones float on the top.

Raw onions, chopped fine and mixed with the food twice a week, are said to be a preventive of chicken cholera.

The cultivation of the bamboo for fencing material has been begun in California. It is said that an acre will produce pickets enough each year to make six miles of fence.

The establishment of mills by the Southern Cotton Oil company is announced fact; they are now erecting eight mills between Texas and North Carolina.

A Thrifty Somerville.

There is a millionaire at Coney Island who perhaps lives less expensively than any other person on the island. He is known as a miner and recluse who of late has been suffering from rheumatism. He first appeared at Coney Island two weeks ago, and rented an attic room in a house on Surf avenue, near Batten avenue, arranging for the use of the kitchen stove for cooking purposes. He subsists chiefly on fish caught by himself from the docks on the thoroughfare or from one of the bridges which spans it. The expense of hiring a boat he could not be induced to afford. Every day when the sun is out he goes to the beach and takes a long sun bath in the sand, which has proven very beneficial. He seldom speaks to any one, but vies to the members of the household in which he resides. A tanner, in speaking of him, said: "I have known him for ten years, and I think his sole thought is how to make money. The poor man up in Philadelphia who are his tenants, breathing the heated air laden with ill-favored smells, are happier than he. Strange to say, he hates men of means, cannot doubtless by envious feelings cannot doubtless by envious feelings which creep through the portals of his brains."—Chicago Herald.

Lockjaw on Long Island.

Who can explain what there is in the air or climate of the Long Island sea coast conducive to the terrible disease of lockjaw? To step on a rusty nail from Fire Island to Montauk is almost sure death. Visitors cannot touch many of the plants or shrubs without being poisoned, although they have no such effect on the scrubbiest scrubbiest from shrub or any sharp surface on the feet, or in fact any part of the body, are sure to result in serious inconvenience for a long time. Yet the natives do not appear to be so sensitive to these influences except in the case of the rusty nail. This is almost inexplicable, for the lockjaw smiths ought to open an expert hospital to study the disease somewhere on the island.—New York Star.

No Happiness in Wealth.

The keenest sorrows of the world are in the homes of people of affluence, who are so much envied by those who struggle in daily toil for bread; but if the skeletons of the homes of the honest sons of labor could be compared with the skeletons of the homes of the rich, both would learn that there is no happiness in idleness, no wealth but the content of industry.—Philadelphia Times.

There are a thousand differences between the human feet, but they are astonishingly alike.—Rev. Sam. Jones.

SHE WAS A NIHILIST.

The Terrible Experience of a Russian Jewess—Among the Refugees.

An episode, which is absolutely true in every detail, will illustrate and explain the feelings of scores of the refugees in America. Not far from a New York police station is a large three story brick building. Years ago it was a handsome dwelling, but time and the small boy have played havoc with its fronts, doors, windows, and railing. It is occupied by a well to do Russian, who years ago fled his native land for alleged complicity in some plot against the czar. He has long been the residence of political refugees of both sexes, Russian Nihilists, Polish Liberators, French Communards, German Socialists, and Cosmopolitan Anarchists. The circle met there is composed of educated and clever people. Nearly all are excellent linguists, and more or less successful in trade, literature, or professional life. Owing probably to the terrible scenes in which they have been actors, all are more or less excitable in behavior, speech, or ideas. Not long since a party of a dozen men and women were spending the evening in the huge old fashioned parlor. All smoked, a few sipped the vitriolic vodka between the whiffs of their cigarettes, while all the rest assuaged thirst with the cheap wines of the Rhine and Moselle. The conversation had been political and literary rather than anecdotal in character, and has flagged until the room was almost silent. The only person speaking was a handsome Jewess of 24 or 25, whose name or nom de guerre was Theodora Omnytsch. She was a fine type of that race, being a smooth blonde with bright golden hair, large lustrous blue eyes, and a splendid form, powerful figure and splendid health which characterizes the Hebrew women in a remarkable degree. Andy Sommer sat at the end of an argument and drained a glass of Josephsbrier, when she began:

"What made you a Nihilist, Dora?"

"Nothing, very remarkable to us Russians," she replied. "I lived in a good family in a small town in the Warsaw province. I married the rabbi of the synagogue, and we were very happy for a few months. The czar then made a change, and sent down a new governor from St. Petersburg to replace our old one, who was a good and just man, although a Russian general. The new comer had every vice and no virtue of any kind. He was so bad and cruel that our friends and relatives wrote us when he came warning us against him. My husband the next Sabbath in the synagogue told our people about him, and advised them to be overanxious in not violating any of the thousand tyrannical laws with which we were cursed. Someone who spoke in Hebrew for fear of spies, some one betrayed him to the governor. He was arrested, tried, flogged on the public square into insensibility, and sent to Siberia for life. I was present when he underwent his agony, and stood it until I became crazed. I broke through the crowd toward the wretch if my husband, kissed him and his master the czar, and severe vengeance against both. I too was arrested, tried, flogged until nearly dead, and sentenced to receive a hundred blows with the rod in the public square. My mother, who was a Christian woman, was taken by drunken moujiks and heathen Cossacks to the place, and forced to witness the whipping post, my clothing torn from my body to the waist, and beaten before all the soldiery and the people of the town. At the twentieth blow I fainted, but the ropes held me up, and the full hundred were counted on my body. They cut me down, rolled me in a cloak and sent me home to die. I did like fire into my back to stop the bleeding, and carried me to the frontier.

"I lay there two months and was discharged. I had but one idea then, and that was vengeance. My parents had agreed to get employment in the governor's palace as sentinels. One afternoon he was in his bath and sent for towels. The attendant was tired, and I volunteered to take them. I threw them over my arm and under them I held a long stiletto sharp as a needle. I passed the guards and he was reading and smoking in the bath. I laid the towels by his side and put my left hand, and at the next moment with my right I drove the knife through his heart. It was splendidly done. He never made a sound, and I escaped to this land. That is why I am a Nihilist. Do any of you doubt?" She sprang excitedly from her chair, and in a half minute had the knife in the table well. The front of her form from neck to belt might have passed for that of Mars. Two of Milo, but the back! Ridges, welts and furrows that crossed and ploughed as if cut with a rusty razor; patches of white, gray, pink, blue and angry red; holes and hollows with big, hideous edges; half visible ribs and the edges of ruined muscles, and all of which moved, contracted and lengthened with the swaying of her body. There was a gasp from every one present. The men lost rose, silently kissed her on the forehead, and helped her to put back her garment. Then again the wine passed round, and what secret toasts were made as the party drank cold beer never be known.—William E. S. Fales in Chicago Times.

The Mania for Collecting.

There is no accounting for the eccentricities of people here in the matter of collecting. I was in a dealer's recently when an old man came in with a bundle of prints to sell. He unwrapped them, he said, and he allowed the prints, which were all valuable old Engravings, to go at a ridiculous sacrifice. Instead of departing when he got the money he began to forage on the book shelves. He kept at it for an hour, and finally bought a couple of books that cost him nearly every copper he had got for the prints. With these under his arm he left the place to all appearance quite contented and happy at having exchanged one encumbrance for another at a heavy sacrifice.—Alfred Trumble in New York News.

Action is Power.

Gen. Sherman, in his West Point speech to the recent graduates, said: "There is an old saying that 'knowledge is power.' This is not true. Action is power, and, when guided by knowledge, produces the largest measure of results. I have encountered men who knew more of the science of war than Grant, Meade or Hancock, whom I would have been ashamed with a picket guard."—Boston Transcript.

Sedentary Men and Stimulants.

It is certain that sedentary men (unless their appetites are restricted) are quite as heavy eaters as laborers. Some of the exceptions comprise those who, by the habitual use of the so called parlorpizzas, tea, coffee, tobacco, wine, etc., daily lessen the waste of the brain and thus diminish the amount of necessary food. Setting these aside, every hospitable housekeeper knows and every experiment proves that sedentary men are quite as large consumers as an equal number of daily laborers. Some insist on largely or fail to obtain sufficient brain supply from food which contains but a small proportion of it. Even then it is probable that the nervous masses often suffer from starvation. Else why the frequent examples of collapse in this class of the community? The only really effective and feasible means of refillation to this dilemma are to be found in the judicious employment of those substances which nature has placed in our hands, apparently for this very purpose, and which the lurbid instinct of man has always discovered and applied. I refer to the use of the so called parkrytics, or preventers of waste in the body. Of these the most common and best known are alcohol, tea, coffee and tobacco. Other substances, such as the Indian Ayamphedra, are in use among all the narcotics, exhibit similar powers.—North American Review.

Medicine for Children must not only be effective but as compleasant to the taste as possible to induce children to take it. Such a preparation for worms (to which almost every child is afflicted) is Parmelee's Santonine Worm Candies, which are made from the best imported Santonine. They are tasty to the use. They work quickly, surely and harmlessly, passing off the worms without a purge. Solved. Do not neglect the children even though they do not complain. Worms are silent, always present. One of the Invalids.—E. M. PARMELEE, Dear Sir:—I have been taking your Dyspepsia, Diabetes, Kidney and Liver Cure for some time past and have received more benefit from it than from all of the $500 worth of doctor's medicines that I have used in the last five years. Before taking the cure I was weak and tired out all the time but now I feel then to be overanxious in not violating any of the thousand tyrannical laws with which we were cursed. Someone who spoke in Hebrew for fear of spies, some one betrayed him to the governor. He was arrested, tried, flogged on the public square into insensibility, and sent to Siberia for life. accomplishes for everybody exactly what is claimed for it. One of the reasons for the great popularity of the Mustang Liniment is found in its wide applicability. Everybody's needs are met by it. The Lumberman uses it in case of accidents. The Housewife needs it for general family use. The Farmer finds it for his cattle and horses. The Mechanic needs it always on his work bench.

The Miner needs it in case of emergency.
The Pioneer cannot travel without it.
The Farmer needs it in his house, his stable and his stock yard.
The Mechanic needs it on his tools.
The Steamboat man or the Boatman needs it in liberal supply at least onboard.
The Horse-fancier needs it—it is his best friend and safest reliance.
The Stock-grower needs it—it will save him thousands of dollars in the course of a year.
The Railroad man needs it and will need it so long as his life is a round of accidents and dangers.
The Backwoodsman needs it. There is scarcely any part of the country where he lives, far from the premises described in said mortgage, or so much as a day's journey from a store, but what he may be attacked by some ailment or disease, for which a bottle of the Mustang Liniment will be found a sovereign remedy. Mortgagee will offer for sale at public auction, to the highest bidder, at the front door of the court house in the city of Detroit, Michigan, (that being the place where the circuit court for Charlevoix county is held) on the premises described in said mortgage, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the amount due on said mortgage, with his fees and interest, and all legal costs, together with an attorney's fee of twenty dollars, provided for by law, the premises being described in said mortgage as follows, viz: The south half (s½) of lot one (1) of section thirty-two (32), in township thirty-one (31) north of Range seven (7) west, containing fifty-three acres of land, more or less.

A FATAL COLLISION IN IOWA.

Five Men Killed and Several Others Hurt in a Train-Wreck.

TWO PASSENGER trains on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad collided on a sharp curve two miles north of Dubuque, Iowa, wrecking both engines and seven cars. Five men were killed and a number of other persons were hurt. The dead are: Fireman Barnes, of Dubuque, supposed to be one of twenty miles an hour. The dead are: Charles Fales, of Dubuque, engineer of the south-bound train; Ara Bates, mead, fireman of the south-bound train; Elmer Winchester, of Dubuque, engineer of the north-bound train; Joseph Cummings, of Dubuque, fireman of the north-bound train; John Pressley, of Milwaukee, a fireman.

Other Railroad Accidents.

TWO FREIGHT trains on the Ft. Wayne Railroad collided near Forest, O., causing the explosion of dynamite in one of the cars. The wreck caught fire and ten loaded cars were destroyed. Fireman Baugh was killed and Engineer Lyons badly injured.

JAMES DULANS and William Banks got drunk and went to sleep on the Lake Shore track near Toledo. They were run over by a freight train, and instantly killed.

THE Bee Line limited, running between Mattoon and Indianapolis, met with an accident at Fera, Ind., in which the engine was overturned and Mike Rolinigien, the engineer, and the fireman, Rodmacher, were killed.

SIOUX CITY'S LATEST SENSATION.

The Muncbrath Verdict a Source of Great Surprise—A New Trial to Be Sought.

SIOUX CITY (Iowa) dispatch says: "The verdict in the Muncbrath case is the absorbing theme of conversation in this city, and has revived the intense interest felt at the trial of Arensdorf. It was a complete surprise to nearly all, and particularly so to the defense, who were confident of a 'hung' jury at worst. The trial of Silvester Grasle, a co-defendant, has been indefinitely continued, as has that of all the defendants, except the chief one. The second trial of John Arensdorf has been assigned for Nov. 14. He is under $25,000 bonds. The defense in the Muncbrath case have given notice that they will move for a new trial, and if this is denied the case will be carried to the Supreme Court. The defendant is under $15,000 bonds, his parents and two others being the sureties."

The Green Diamond.

THE race for the championship of the League is becoming decidedly interesting, as will be seen by the appended record of the eight contesting clubs:

Clubs.	Won.	Lost.	Percentage.
Detroit	79	34	.699
Chicago	77	37	.675
Philadelphia	71	40	.639
New York	67	45	.598
Pittsburg	57	60	.487
Washington	56	60	.483
Indianapolis	37	79	.319
St. Louis	37	80	.316

St. Louis still maintains a long lead in the American Association pennant race. The following shows the record of wins and lost games:

Clubs.	Won.	Lost.	Percentage.
St. Louis	77	37	.675
Cincinnati	73	39	.652
New York	68	44	.607
Baltimore	63	49	.562

GENERAL ROGER A. PRYOR has decided to undertake the case of the condemned anarchists.

THE George Weber Brewing Company, of Cincinnati, has made an assignment, with $500,000 liabilities and $250,000 assets. Preferences for a large amount were given.

PRESIDENT FAIR, of the Nevada Bank, asserts that neither Flood nor Mackay knew anything about its connection with the great wheat deal until told of it by Bradner, the bank manager. The bank's loss was between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000.

A VERY serious fire, which completely swept out of existence seven of the best blocks of business buildings, took place at Ironwood, Mich. The entire loss is estimated at $150,000, on which there is but partial insurance.

THE Russian nihilists are becoming aggressive again. A pamphlet has been circulated in St. Petersburg, announcing that they have reorganized and are prepared for a vigorous campaign against the government. In Siberia nihilism is making rapid strides. Forty-five guards absconded and twenty-three prisoners escaped during August.

THE EASTERN STATES.

THE Constitutional celebration was continued at Philadelphia, on Friday, the 16th, when about half a million strangers are said to have been in the city. The President, attended by Secretary Bayard, ex-President Hayes and other notabilities, received the mayor of the Custom House, and was afterward tendered a reception at the Commercial Exchange, where he made a brief address, urging the importance of a more active interest and participation in public affairs by the business classes. From the Exchange the Presidential party proceeded to Broad and Walnut streets, where they reviewed the pageant parade, which was led by Lieutenant General Sheridan. About 20,000 men were in line. A Philadelphia dispatch says:

The military parade was under command of Colonel Sheridan, it included regulars, a battalion of blue coats, and taken as a whole, it was a large one and very creditable. The most demonstration of modern times. The sound of fife and drum, and the peculiar inspiration of the nation's protectors. Even during the same day of war the rebellion the sight of our brave soldiers in Philadelphia, was the signal for repeated cheering, and when the Grand Army veterans passed by, it was the signal for a prolonged cheering, and when the veterans of the navy passed by, it was the signal for a prolonged cheering, and when the veterans of the marine corps passed by, it was the signal for a prolonged cheering, and when the veterans of the Washington Guards passed by, it was the signal for a prolonged cheering, and when the veterans of the Grand Army of Philadelphia passed by, it was the signal for a prolonged cheering, and when Mayor Fox, of Philadelphia, and Mayor Cleveland, of New York, and Mayor Colby, of Wilmington, and Mayor Colby introduced the President, the President took off his hat, and it was some time before Mr. Cleveland could be heard. He said: I thank you for the opportunity to meet so large a representation of the people of this great city. It is well that we should not entirely forget in the midst of our material prosperity the aim and purpose of our government, and the high and noble purpose of our material industry. The people and the government. The thought has been suggested to me that in the hurry and rush of business their minds will be in less a little more patriotism than we are wont to think. Our government is founded on the idea that a wholesale political sentiment is closely connected with our material well-being, and the general success of our business. Of course our business interests are quite as much as the leading of all the affairs of life, and it is a mistake that patriotism and business are not in the interest of the government. The success of our business depends upon the enjoyment of the blessings resulting from our government. The trade and business interests represented by the different trades and callings have grown a hundred years ago. Therefore the greatest prosperity and the greatest good to the greatest number of people by our form of government can only be secured by an exercise of the patriotic interests of our people. The prosperity of our country is not the result of a political thought, when they cease to act in the party ranks and become neutral. It is the opinion that there is no place in the country where the business interests of the people are more intelligent and enterprising business men than in Philadelphia.

The third and last day of the memorial celebration of the signing of the Constitution attracted thousands of Philadelphia Sept. 17, and the programme exercises were carried out with great enthusiasm. President Cleveland, attended by Secretaries Bayard and Fairchild, held a well-attended reception in the Supreme court room in the City Hall, Broad and Market streets. At 10:30 o'clock the President, party left the City Hall and proceeded to the great memorial meeting in Independence Square. A chorus of two thousand men and two thousand children opening the proceedings with a patriotic air, and a little after 11 o'clock the President, and Mrs. Cleveland, leading a double column of distinguished visitors, ascended the steps leading to the grand stand, amid deafening cheers. Bishop Potter opened the formal proceedings with prayer. Hon. John A. Kasson, President of the Constitutional Centennial Commission, made the opening speech, which was followed by the address of President Cleveland. The memorial oration, which followed the President's speech, was delivered by Judge Samuel F. Miller, of the United States Supreme Court. The celebration ended with a grand banquet.

FIFTY-EIGHT colored men who were arrested for gambling in "club-houses" were discharged by a New York police magistrate on the novel ground that they had as much right to play in their own rooms as the swells of the Manhattan and Union League clubs had to play in theirs.

THE WESTERN STATES.

THE safe of the County Treasury at Greenville, Darke County, Ohio, was found open Monday morning and a large amount of money is missing. County Treasurer Simon and his son were arrested, the father being charged with embezzling $25,000, and the boy with the secrecy of $40,000. Both waived examination and gave bail. Simon's sureties have also been closed by the Sheriff. The new County Treasurer was to assume charge in a few days, and Simon claims the cash was left by robbers.

A DENVER dispatch says that a negro cook named Joe Dixon, employed at the Hotel Beaumont in Ouray, Col., who had a fancied grievance against Miss Ella Day, waitress, shot her four times with a large revolver, three balls taking effect in her arms and the other in her breast. Dixon was arrested and jailed. Early the following morning a mob went to the jail for the purpose of lynching the negro. They captured the guard, but failed to gain an entrance. They then entered parts of the building with coal-oil and set it afire. The Fire Department came out, and, in an attempt to extinguish the flames, drowned the negro, whose body was roasted in the burning building. The wounded girl is not expected to recover.

The Arbeiter-Zeitung, Chicago organ of the Reds, which only a short year and one-half ago craved for the blood of every man who was not an anarchist, has modified its tone a little. Here is its brief comment on the decision of the Illinois Supreme Court in the case of the convicted Reds:

To the unprejudiced, the supposedly impossible has happened. Our health bulletin to speak, the Illinois Supreme Court has refused to free from the pen to the Illinois Supreme Court has refused to free from the pen to the Illinois Supreme Court has refused to free from the pen to Rand, McNally & Co. of Chicago, have issued a large sectional map of Michigan, 40x52 inches, showing the new counties created by the last legislature, and all the recently established postoffices and otherwise revised to date, for the small sum of one dollar.

THE first race of the season for America's cup at the course of the New York yacht club took place Tuesday, and the American sloop Volunteer beat the Scotch cutter Thistle so badly that the latter's most enthusiastic champions have only to say that something inexplicable was the matter with the Thistle.

THE New York World says that when the constitution was framed there were thirteen states in the union. Now there are thirty eight. The population of the United States in 1790, when the first census was taken, was 3,929,214. It is now nearly or quite 60,000,000. There were then about 1,500 federal office-holders in the country. There are now more than 100,000. The total net ordinary receipts of the United States in 1792 were $3,661,000. In 1886 they were $336,439,000. The total net ordinary expenditures in 1792 were $8,203,000. In 1886 they were $242,483,000.

The general demand for the hanging of the Chicago anarchists reminds us of the time when all insisted that Jeff Davis must be hanged. Had the people had their way Davis would be remembered as a saint today, and it is doubtful if the north and south could have been reconciled. As it is he is regarded as a silly old fool, and nobody respects him. No matter how guilty the anarchists may be, their death will make their memory sacred to their half-crazy adherents, and in our opinion it would be far better to imprison them, and let them be forgotten.—Independent.

Land Holding by Corporations.

In several states aliens are now prohibited ownership of real estate. Experience has demonstrated such holding detrimental to the welfare of the people. Public opinion, which, to a certain extent, affects the citizen in his management of such property, in the case of the alien is imperative. Having no personal acquaintance with his tenant, no sympathy for his welfare can affect him. The lands are worked for all they are worth and their fertility destroyed by such tenancies, for the object of the landlord is to get all the rent he can during the lease.

Public policy demanded the legal abrogation of such tenancies. A corporation has been defined as a soulless entity, with a legal existence and being, for whose conduct no individual can be held responsible. The only punishment society can visit upon it is the death penalty. For all these minor offenses for which individuals can be held and punished, society can inflict no penalty. It is incapable of sympathy with any one in its dealings. Public opinion can affect it only as some individual is generally recognized as in its control and responsible morally, for its acts. One of the main purposes of its organization being to conceal personality, it is only in rare instances that any individual can be held for the reproof by public opinion. Morally speaking, whenever its charter is granted, it is of necessity as alien and foreign to all with whom it has dealings as can be any subject of Great Britain. If it purchases land it is never to use it for production, never to make its ownership beneficial to society. The purpose for which a land company is organized is merely to obtain legal possession of more or less acres and hold them out of market until all around its territory settlers have absorbed the lands in the market, and when a society has been so created, to reap the added value created by the energy and industry of others.

The same public policy that justifies the legal exclusion of the foreign landlord or landholder demands even more energetically the prohibition of corporate land-holding.—Chicago Herald.

Fruit at the State Fair.

The Free Press reporter at the state fair gives the following in relation to the fruit display, making special mention of the Charlevoix fruit: The fruits and flowers of the state fair are arranged in Pomological Hall by the officers of the State Horticultural Society. There are no premiums offered in this division, the exhibit having been arranged with reference to bringing out the fruits of the newer counties. Twenty-one counties have display of their fruits and large placards tell the observer the story of the exhibit.

There is a spread of 3,000 plates of fruit and over 1,100 plants, every nook and corner in the hall being occupied. Entering on the east side, at the left, is the Agricultural College display of 172 plates of tomatoes and thirty-seven kinds of peppers. This is the most complete exhibit of the kind ever made in the world so far as recorded. Arranged on tables the whole length of this side of the hall are exhibits from Berrien, Jackson, Lapeer and Eaton counties, while Allegan, Wexford, Van Buren and Kent occupy the end farthest from the entrance, and several lesser exhibits from individuals.

The range of fruit spread by Lake, Antrim, Charlevoix, Benzie and Midland counties astonishes even the old pomological veterans who have for years been claiming great things for this north country.

Michigan Mention

The Evening News says that Cheboygan is to have a life-size boycott. Some of the merchants have been buying dude coal stoves, and their stores are to be avoided by a lot of farmers who live in the back towns and have timber on their land thicker than the hair on a dog.

St. Ignace has the natural gas fever, and have put down a well with quite promising results. Cheboygan is beginning to experience similar symptoms. Probably if Charlevoix had a very severe attack of the same fever the indications of coal and oil in this county would materialize in the form of natural gas.

The St. Ignace Republican says: It has been decided at last by the management of the Duluth, South Shore & Atlantic railroad, that next week work will commence on the extensive addition to the merchandise pier and the mammoth ship dock for the new transfer steamer now being built by the Detroit dry dock company, and the contract calls for the completion of the same by not later than December.

A Legacy, Not a Lawsuit.

A man may now, if he is careful and wise in his choice of a company, insure his life, or, if insured, he may have the temerity to die, without a fairly grounded expectation of leaving his family a lawsuit for a legacy. He may also be reasonably sure that he is not placing his own reputation (after he is unable to defend it) at the mercy of a powerful corporation intent upon saving its funds from the inroads of a just debt. And I question if it is too much to say that, given enough money, a strong motive and a powerful corporation on the one hand, and only a sorrowing family on the other, no man ever lived or died whose reputation could not be blackened beyond repair, after he was himself unable to explain or refute seeming irregularities of conduct or dishonesty of motive. No man's character is invulnerable, and no man's reputation can afford the strain or test of such a contest. Millions of dollars have been withheld from rightful heirs by threats of an exposure—the more vague the more frightful—of the unnamed crimes or misdeeds of the beloved dead.

Thousands of cases never known to the public have been "compromised" and hundreds of heart-aches and unjust suspicions and fears about the dead, which can never be corrected, are averted in surrowing but loving breasts by this method of doing "business." It is, of course, of the utmost importance that every precaution be taken by life insurance companies to protect the funds held by them in trust for others against fraud and trickery. But with the agent, the examining physician, the medical directors and the inspectors, all employed by and answerable to the company represented, if fraud is committed in getting into the company, one or all of those paid officers must almost of necessity be party to that fraud. With all these safe guards in the hands of the company, if a man is accepted as a "good risk," if he pays his premiums, surely his family has the right to expect a legacy and not a lawsuit nor a "compromise" which must cast reproach on the dead.—Popular Science Monthly.

Danger in Idle Boilers.

Any boiler that has been standing idle for a few weeks or months is a dangerous thing to enter, and no one should attempt it until it has been thoroughly ventilated by taking off all the man hole and hand hole plates and throwing water into it. This is due to the presence of a gas which is generated from the refuse and mud, or scale, which, to a greater or less degree, remains in all boilers. Contact with fire is certain to result in an explosion. Not long since a locomotive was in a roundhouse, where it had been waiting some weeks for repairs. Some of the tubes were split and a man was pulling them out. He had only removed one or two when, putting in his lamp to see what remained, there was a fearful explosion, which shook the shop. An inspector of the Hartford Boiler Insurance company had the same experience, and so many of these occurrences have taken place that it is well to use the precautions mentioned. There are many other places which are unsafe to enter when they have been long closed, such as wells, pits or any kind and tanks. Precisely what the nature of the gas is no one seems to know, but it is assuredly settled that a man who goes into it with a light seldom comes out unharmed.—The Mining Engineer.

HON. LEVI P. MORTON.

HOME LIFE OF THE EX-MINISTER TO FRANCE.

A Lover of Home and Its Pleasures, but Prone to Politics Too—The Element Dinners He Gives—Charitable Tendencies of Both Mr. and Mrs. Morton.

[Special Correspondence.]

NEW YORK, Sept. 12.—The character of Levi P. Morton, ex-minister to France, presents two apparently antagonistic phases—a passion for the quiet of domestic life and an insatiable ambition for political preferment. Of an even temperament, not easily aroused to enthusiasm, quiet and suave in his manners, and regular in his habits, he is peculiarly adapted to home life; yet his hobby is politics, and few men are as well versed in public affairs as he. Mr. Morton's first entrance into political life was when he was elected to congress in 1878. Since then he has met many marked successes and several bitter disappointments. In 1880, when Garfield was nominated for president, Mr. Morton's name was suggested for the vice presidency, but he declined the nomination. When Garfield became president he offered him a cabinet office as secretary of the navy. This he refused, it is said, through the advice of Roscoe Conkling. He was afterward appointed minister to France. After his return from that country his ambition was to represent New York in the senate, and his defeat last winter was a serious disappointment to him.

When not actively engaged in politics, Mr. Morton leads a quiet and happy life. He delights in home comforts and lives in a luxurious though not ostentatious manner. His wife is a charming and pretty woman, considerably his junior, his second wife and the mother of all his children. Although a prominent member of several clubs, he seldom visits them, preferring to pass a quiet evening at home with his family. Occasionally he gives a very quiet dinner party or reception, notable gatherings of the most distinguished people in the land, but aside from these entertainments his life is simple and serene. Business cares give him little cause for worry. Go into his banking house at any hour of the day, and no matter how busy he may be, you will always find the same calm, collected gentleman. Mr. Morton takes an active interest in the banking house of which he is senior partner, and when in the city is always at his office during business hours. In the winter he occupies his brownstone mansion at the corner of Eightseventh street and Fifth avenue. Here he has a valuable collection of paintings and bronzes, picked up during his stay in Europe, which he exhibits to his friends with delight. He claims to be a connoisseur of plants and flowers also, and his conservatory contains many rare specimens of exotics. Besides his residence in New York he owns a house in Washington and fine estates at Newport and Saratoga. His wealth is estimated by his intimates at millions. But he is simple and unostentatious in his habits, and his wife are exceedingly charitable, and there is scarcely an institution in the city to which they do not subscribe. He spends thousands of dollars each year in this way. Grace Church house, a beautiful gothic structure of white marble on fourth avenue, was built by him in memory of his first wife. It is the neat perfect child's nursery in the city. Every day poor women who work away from home leave their little children there to be cared for until nightfall. They are fed and those who are poorly clad are given clothing. Mr. Morton bears the expense of the institution. In regard to dress, Mr. Morton displays the best of taste. His clothes always fit him to perfection, and are cut according to the latest fashion. His neckties, scarfpins, gloves, canes and hats are chosen with the best of judgment, and his shining patent leather gaiters show off his slender foot to good advantage.

Mr. Morton made a strong fight in campaign last fall, when he was running against Miller and Hornblower for a seat in the United States senate, and I found him one of the most difficult men to interview I have ever met. Always a gentleman, he never meets a question with a snub, but adroitly changes his position from the interviewed to the interviewer. Non-committal when questioned, he is ever ready to question, and so baffles the most persistent reporter. He never conducts a campaign in person, leaving that to his managers, in whom he places implicit reliance. MORTON'S HOUSE.

Both Greatly Rushed.

A young man at college wrote as follows to his father: "My dear father, I have only time—being greatly rushed with my studies—to send my love and tell you that I wish you would send me $50." The father replied: "My dear son, I have only time—being greatly rushed with my hay—to send love and tell you that I have not sent you $50."—Arkansaw Traveler.

WHAT THEY WILL WEAR.

Latitude, Diversity and Simplicity on Hand.

[Special Correspondence.]

NEW YORK, Sept. 15.—What is called "latitude" exists in fashion's kingdom this winter. Where is the woman who is not glad of that? Latitude is the stanch and loyal friend to both rich and poor. Anything you wear will be permissible, because latitude is abroad. "Diversity" is well also prevail, and Diversity, with a big, big D, is first cousin to latitude and a true friend to woman. And a remote cousin to these two is also to be on hand, a fair, sweet, young thing called Simplicity. With all these to help us we shall get through the winter as size 6 or 7 please, and possibly have a little dinner money left in our purses when the frost come and the spring drives the winds away.

The thing called a plastron is more frequent than ever. As its name, literally pronounced, indicates, it is an article to "plaster on"—otherwise a covering of the facts, an ekor out of toilet deficiencies. I need not define a plastron, but I will do so, just to please myself. It is a collar-like affair, with an attachment to come down on the corsage in front, and behind, too, sometimes, and give finish to a toilet. While it is giving finish it is also covering defects. At least, it can do both if it wants to. It may be made of crepe, lace, net, silk or jet or other colored beads. The jet ones are just now holding the fort, as they always do in the fall.

Our dear old friend, the polonaise, is to be on hand this winter. I suppose there are benighted souls living here and there who continue to pronounce it the "polonay," because they first heard of it by that name from some one not high up in the theory. To such I say "don't." Pronounce it as it is spelled and you will not be scared at all (unless you are). The polonaise is made of thick cloth, very long in front and close to the edge of the skirt behind. It is drawn from the front and caught up on one or both sides with ging ornaments or ribbon bows. They are worn over black or colored velvet or cocoanut skirts and have cuffs and collars of the same color as the skirt. Very pretty shirts for very swell occasions, coaching and other showy doings, are made of heavy white satin. They are ornamented with buttons that cost a Democratic dinner for four at least.

This is the day of the girdle. Theodora brought it in, and here it stays, proving larger and heavier all the time. It is an adjunct of the aesthetic, and brings with it great tenacity. It has brought the plain, old style belt back, and here it is in dapper dress leather and ever so many other things.

It is hinted that the frivolous in garments is all being taken up by men. They are wearing it in necktie and elsewhere, and during the past summer many have worn gay ribbons on their hats. It has been remarked that perhaps the woman mayor in Argonia, Kansas, has had something to do with the fashion of a rough, mannish looking material for street gowns. If we are to become mayors and other heavy officials, let us look it. The man who wears a red necktie has been warned that there is no chance for him if he runs for office against any one of us clothed, like the pioneers, in cloth of great thickness.

Bodices are still the great feature of a toilet. All the efforts of the dressmaker have been concentrated on the fit of the corsage. For dinners, the wearer likes to be very decollete, the French fashion of the back of the dress being open from down, or further than the front, is in vogue. Tea jackets are in. They are antitutes for tea gowns. They are in black or orders, and are worn with rich lace skirts. Velvet plush is much used for these. Here is one.

Cashmere made up on a coarse is having as great a run as the satin that has had—almost, not quite.

THE JACKET.

This combination is lovely for autumn wear.

The thickest, roughest looking stuff imaginable is on the shelf for outdoor wraps in cases. Nothing is too coarse to be and smooth in comparison with it. If it is coarse enough it will do for quilting and fussing. Plainness to the point of nudity seems to be favored by all, because nothing else can be done with it.

The big plaids are appearing on the streets, and they are very seasonable. The initial when questioned, he is ever ready to question, and so baffles the most persistent reporter. He never conducts a campaign in person, leaving that to his managers, in whom he places implicit reliance. As a speaker he is not eloquent, but his remarks are always worthy of attention on account of the common sense they contain. Stockman & Iddings were the only exhibitors of hardware at the county fair and they merited much praise for their enterprise. Besides a number of their articles they selected and exhibited several of the stoves from their fine stock.

Some merchants complain that advertising does not pay. These merchants are the ones who will grumble loudest if, when they get in a new stock of goods, the editor does not find it out, some way or other, and give them a local in the paper.

It is definitely settled at last that the company now operating the Manistee & Mancelona iron furnace will plant a large one at Boyne Falls immediately. The ground selected is that north of the grist mill, and between the railroad and river.—Petoskey Record.

Those who are contemplating buying additional stoves, or putting in a furnace to keep warm next winter, and all who are building new houses, should examine the new furnace recently put into the Lewis block by Washburn & Ackert. It is reported as giving excellent satisfaction, and the makers naturally feel proud of their work.

The Charlevoix Business Men's Association sent a delegate to interview various manufacturers throughout the state, and he has returned with the most encouraging prospects. We congratulate our neighbors on their prospects, and would like to see all other northern Michigan towns follow the example Charlevoix has set.—Independent.

We are creditably informed that a number of persons failed to pay their village taxes last year, and other persons past. That instead of enforcing the tax against the property or collecting the same by personal action, the amount was simply added to the amount required this year, thus making the village taxes doubly burdensome to those who do pay, while some do not pay at all. The matter should be investigated, and if this allegation is true, then the error should be corrected.

The marriage license law went into effect Tuesday, and Albert R. Wells, of Norwood was the first in the county to apply. Tuesday evening Mr. Wells and Miss Louisa, daughter of W. J. McGeagh, of Norwood were married by Rev. C. F. VanAuken. And now upon the question being raised, it has been claimed that the law did not take effect until Wednesday, the 28th. The licences issued Tuesday are void.

The schooner Shepard that went on the beach last week was released Sunday afternoon. The wind Thursday and Friday caused quite a sea that drove the vessel high into shallow water so that she lay broadside upon the sand. The owner in Chicago being notified, dispatched the wrecking tug Williams of Manistee, with steam pump to assist in taking her off. The tug Campbell dredged a channel nine feet deep alongside the vessel, and at sundown Sunday she was floating. Monday morning the tug Williams took her to Manistee for repairs.

In justice to the captain of the schooner L. P. Shepard, which went on the beach last week, it should be stated that his failure to take a tug was not because of a "royal contempt for tugs," as has been stated, but because there was no tug at the outer harbor ready to take him inside, and as a choice between riding at anchor in the gale which was coming on, or trying to make his own way into the harbor, he chose the latter. The outer harbor was being stronger than he had calculated on, he missed the channel and of course went on the beach before the vessel could be brought up to the wind.

Some of our business men are taking the initiatory steps toward the organization of a driving club, or an organization of a similar nature. In our opinion an organization of this kind would be a benefit to Charlevoix as it would encourage the keeping of a better class of horses. When this is done, and grounds have been procured with buildings, a horticultural society might be organized with benefit to the farmers, and those engaged in raising fruit and vegetables. All who are interested in husbandry should assist in this organization and become members. If this is done there is no doubt about ground being broken for a track this fall.

Tho Farr, Field and Stockman, of Chicago, which, by the way, is one of the best and most reliable agricultural papers which comes to our exchange table, appeared last week in an entire new dress, including a new heading. Typographically, as well as in the character of its contents, this journal is in the front rank. For several years the publishers of this paper have been engaged in the useful enterprise of collecting new and improved varieties of grain, vegetables, flowers, etc., and sending out the seed free to its readers for further trial and introduction, each yearly subscriber receiving twenty packets free. If any of our readers want a live agricultural paper we advise them to send as above for a sample copy.

As some have expressed doubts that the Ann Arbor & Ann Arbor railroad company will connect with the D. C. & E. route, and run the road to Charlevoix, we print the following from the Clare Democrat, which shows that that company is working this way rapidly: Railroad is the principal topic of conversation on the streets of Clare at present. "Well, the T. & A. A. has arrived at last" is the general expression. Yes, the iron was laid into the village last evening and our citizens feel very jubilant over the matter. A gang of men were employed Sunday in putting in the crossing at the junction of the new road with the F. & P. M. men crossed the latter road Monday and are pushing northward at a rapid rate. To say that the people are delighted don't express their feelings. "We'll have a population of 5,000 in 1890," sure enough. Don't forget it.

Coming Events.

There will be a box social at the Barnard school house on Tuesday evening Oct. 4, for the benefit of the pastor. Everybody are invited, and bring your cups and saucers.

Obituary.

Philemon Kirkham Brown was born in Cornwall, Addison Co., Vt., on the 11th day of October, 1801, died in Potsdam, St. Lawrence county, N. Y., on the 18th day of September, 1887. Cornmercial business life in Vergennes, Vt., and married Udilla Reynolds of Panton, Vt., at the age of 25. To them was born a son, Walter Phillemon, now of Charlevoix, Michigan, and a daughter, Welty, now Mrs. Barrows of this place. At the age of 29 the wife died in 1833. Two years later he married the widow Lyon of Hinesburgh, Vt., who had at the time a daughter, now Mrs. S. D. Ray of this village, and removed to this town in March, 1835. From that time to 1864, when the second wife died, his was an active and in all respects a very successful life, made so by his sterling integrity, high moral and christian character. Was genial, social, correct in judgment, prudent and industrious, acquiring a competency. He has since spent most of his time in this village with Mrs. Ray his foster daughter, taking good care of his resources and adding to them. The last two or three years increasing cares and infirmities led his friends to his home with his son, W. P. Brown in Charlevoix. He came here with him on a visit and thought to return this week when he was prostrated with paralysis of all the functions of life, induced by extreme old age. He retained his vigor of mind remarkably; within two weeks of his death he attended to a transfer of real estate with all his accustomed critical care and ability. He died as he lived honored and respected by all who knew him, in the comfort of a reasonable religious and holy hope, at peace with God his Saviour and in perfect charity with the world.—Potsdam Courier & Freeman.

UNDER THE CHANDELIER.

BY ZEPPIE PURDUM HAWKURD.

They stand just under the chandelier,
The music sounds faint, the lights are dim,
He whispers, "I love you," he has no fear,
For she is his wife, and he is her lover.
She is tall, and stately, and full of grace,
And he is as dark as she is fair,
Her dress is a marvel of silk and lace,
And diamonds gleam in her golden hair.

Deeper rapture is expressed in her face,
She wonders if this is the way it will end?
She knows one who he can know his place,
Who continue her most devoted friend.
She tells him this, in her winning way,
And tries to soften the blow she gives,
Her disappointment is great, I say,
And perhaps to the longest day she lives.

She hands him a rose, a goodby token,
He does not think, as she sweetly smiles;
"Tis only a man's heart breaking, broken
By a thoughtless woman's witching wiles.
He has gone. The lights were never so dim,
The room is empty, silent, and dread—
In her silks and laces, tall and slim,
Alone she stands under the chandelier.

A FORETASTE OF WAR.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

Upon my introduction to actual hostilities, the aspect of things appeared quite serious, but it turned out rather a farce. Still there was a real prospect of bloodshed in the adventure, and the writer and some fifty or sixty other patient young soldiers in blue, with and without shoulder-straps, then satisfied themselves that they were not afraid to go were there was danger of being shot at. Anyway, the story is worth telling.

It happened about April or May, 1862. I had been in the military service of the United States since the previous September, and I had not yet heard a bullet fly. I was a subaltern in the Tenth New York Cavalry Regiment. The government had employed recruiting before we had got organized, and it looked in the late fall of 1861 as though we should never be a regiment. Finally, in the last days of December, eight companies were mustered in, and we were dispatched southward from Elmira. It was that time closer up to the second battle of Bull Run, eight months later, the Government troops as very much as though we were surperfluous, and of no manner of use. First, we were put in barracks at Pittsburg. That now world-wide famous town had not been discovered at that time; it lay amid the hills of Southern Pennsylvania in all its original Dutch cleanliness, and nobody dreamed of such a thing as that the greatest battle of the war was to be fought on that very ground. Surely, when we buried one of our comrades on grand Cemetery Hill one lovely spring Sabbath the very first soldier ever interred on that historic spot—he would have been deemed crazy who had predicted that in little more than a year a deadly tempest of fire, lead, and iron would rage about this spot, and that, a little later on, thousands of soldiers graves would dot those heights.

No; we never dreamed of such a thing. We were at Gettysburg till the following March; the regiment was not mustered till August. We had an exceedingly good time. We had some dismounted drill; we ate large quantities of apple-butter and hominy, the principal products of the region; and those of us who were young and frivolous (as nearly all soldiers were in those days) flirted with the Dutch girls. I have always thought that if our field officers had not continually retired up the War Department on the subject of mounting us and putting us into the field, we would have been right there when General Lee invaded Pennsylvania. But in March we were ordered to get on the line of the railroad from Baltimore to Harpers Ferry, at the mouth of the Susquehanna, and guard it. As dull sabers were not very efficient weapons to guard anything with, a lot of second-hand but still serviceable muskets were issued to us. And then the lively row, that just fell short of being a mutiny! The men protested and swore that they were cavalry, not infantry, and accused the officers of conspiracy with the War Department to force muskets upon them, and thus change their proud position in the service. We were, in fact, up to that time about as much cavalry as a lot of wooden hobby-horses are; but that made no difference with what the men thought to be their reserved rights. At last they were convinced that this was to be merely a temporary service, and the muskets were accepted.

From the stern realities of war as I saw it in 1861 and 1864, my mind goes back to those pleasant four months along that railroad, and represents it a delightful example of "playing soldier."

The region is the same that was invaded by that fire-eating guerilla, Harry Gilmore, and his band when, in the July of 1864, while Early was invading Maryland, they rode around Hatting, stopped a railroad train at Gunpowder Bridge, captured General Franklin on it, and put everybody in terror by their capers.

Interestingly was peaceable enough about there in the summer of 1862. For sixty or eighty miles the road runs around the head of Chesapeake Bay, and at each few miles of the distance a wide inlet is crossed by a railroad bridge. We were split up into detachments, and posted at these bridges, to prevent them from being eaten up by the shad. I couldn't really see that there was anything else to do. The inhabitants of the country were generally loyal; but they were all kind and hospitable, the Secessionists as much so as the Union folks. So we also shad, visited the citizens, made frequent visits to Baltimore, read about the Peninsula Campaign, and wondered why McClellan didn't take Richmond. In short, we had a glorious time, and put on all the airs of real soldiers.

One day the profound quiet of this situation at the Back River Station, six miles from Baltimore, was broken by a hot skirmish. The enemy of our region came to Captain Pratt (commanding Company A) and told him that a company of Baltimore Secessionists were aboard a schooner, just off North Point, only four or five miles from Back River, and were about to go south somewhere to join the Confederate army. We knew that the negro was both loyal and reliable, and we saw a prospect of some real work. Major Avery had his quarters at this station; but was absent on this day. I was on the regimental staff, and also stationed here.

Captain Pratt, Lieutenant Weed, and myself held a brief council of war. I don't suppose that we three young fellows realized at the time that, acting in such a matter on our own responsibility, and without orders, we might get ourselves into a serious scrape with our superiors. We all felt the same way about the matter. It was the first chance that had been granted to us to see any real service, and we were not the chance to miss it. The Captain mustered his orders, and when the men found out what was in the wind, they were as eager to go as we were to lead them.

The Captain and I mounted our horses and the Lieutenant marched with the men. The muskets had been loaded and capped, and the cartridge boxes were full. Sure enough, when we came round the Point, there was a tall-masted vessel, without sails, anchored perhaps a hundred yards from the shore. We could see a number of men on the deck. The place was about where the British landed in 1814.

The negro had informed us where two boats were secreted. We dragged them out, got in, and rowed out to the vessel.

Now the reader will readily see what might and probably would have happened, had the situation been what we had every reason to suppose it to be. One dozen determined men, with no better arms than we had, might have held that deck in defiance of us. They could have killed and wounded half of us before our boats could have reached the vessel; they could have easily beaten us off altogether.

I think our hearts were all pretty well up toward our mouths, in anticipation of something of this sort, and our men were all ready to use their muskets on the slightest hostile demonstration. But never a shot was fired. We boarded the vessel and took possession. Our prisoners were about thirty well-dressed young fellows, without arms, who, as it turned out, were the sons of some of the wealthiest families in Balt more, and who had really started to join the Confederate army in this manner. We took them to the city and delivered them to General Dix. I really think the young fellows should have been sent to Fort Lafayette for a while; but their parents begged hard for their release, promising that they would be answerable for their future conduct, and the kind old General discharged them. I will venture that some of them found their way to the Confederate armies.

The affair made some noise in the Baltimore papers, and Company A had high praise.

The strangest part of the thing was, that cavalry—armed with muskets—should capture a vessel. A queer mixture—Chicago Ledger.

HOW THE MISER'S GOLD CAME TO THE VETERAN.

Rumors of the enemy's approach had all day agitated the village. At noon a farmer rode into town, and reported that from the roof of his house he had seen thousands of armed men passing upon a road about a mile off. He was certain they would enter the village.

The intelligence filled the poor people with profound distress. To be despoiled of their substance, and to have their homes destroyed by stragglers or marauders, was the least they could anticipate. A panic possessed them. Some hastily secreted their valuables, and others set forth leaving all behind property. A few of the old, the infirm, and the bed-ridden remained, and in a few instances the more courageous of the men; but the bulk of the several hundred inhabitants made their way as best they might to the mountains, where they remained that night. When, the next day, some of the boldest ones went back to reconnoiter, they found their worst fears confirmed. The village was nearly all consumed by fire. Some who had ventured to remain were found tied up to the trees of trees. They told pitiful stories of blows with the flats of sabers and threatenings with pistols to make them tell where treasure had been buried.

His cabin was thoroughly searched while this scene was enacted, but nothing was found worth taking away; and when the military outlaws rode off, after firing the cabin, they left its occupant standing on the ground.

Others who had been plundered or injured boldly by these raiders had fled to the whole village Moses Dimock had not one. He was more or outcast than before. An epidemic prevailed through the village that the recluse had lost all his hoardings; and it must be said that the people were generally pleased to believe it.

The poor old man became a pitiable object to behold. He wandered aimlessly about the village, unkempt and ragged. Where he slept, what he ate, nobody knew—nor cared. His hands twitched with palsy. His eye was dull; his walk feeble and vacillating. In less than a year from the time of the raid, he entirely lost his speech. It was generally believed that the terrors of that night where he was bound, tortured and threatened with death before his blazing house, had given him a shock, both mental and physical, from which he would never recover.

Winter came, and one night, homeless, friendless and helpless, Dimock fell exhausted on the steps of Robert Winslow's dwelling. The owner of this humble abode had been absent some time, and had seen such suffering as only soldiers see. Upon his discharge he had resumed work as a mechanic, and with a wife and three children to support, was vorsly pressed by poverty. Yet the charity of the poor and lowly is not only the sweetest, but the most frequent; and when Winslow, hearing the moan of the old man fall upon the steps, came to the door, he was moved with compassion at the sight. He took the outcast in his arms, and brought him into the house.

The man would not be prolonged. Until his death, which happened ten months later, Moses Dimock found a home, and just attention in this house. He was entirely helpless. He could not speak at all; his hands shook so with palsy that he could neither write nor feed himself. He became so feeble in the last weeks of his life that he had to be lifted and carried like an infant. Still the good veteran and his wife persevered in their charitable work, spite of their poverty, and notwithstanding the rather heartless comments of some of their neighbors. At the old man was deeply grateful for all this kindness was plainly to be seen from his face. And then his efforts to speak were so earnest and so vain that they were painful to behold.

But when he came to die, his voice for one minute came back to him; and this is what he said:

"God love you, dear souls, for your kindness. You know how I have struggled for speech; you don't know how I have silently prayed that I might in some way have the power to tell you my secret. When the news came that the raiders were on the way I buried my gold—a thousand dollars of it—under the stone door-step of the cabin. Then I foolishly stayed behind to watch it. They came, and they threatened me, they left me almost dead, but I never told them the secret. The gold is there now, and it is all yours; if it were ten times as much you would deserve it."

So the old miner's gold came to the worthy veteran, Robert Winslow.

Habits of Flowers.

Flowers have habits, or ways of acting, just as people have. Some are stubborn and shy. There are some flowers that shut themselves at night so as to go to sleep, and open again in the morning. Tulips do this. I was once admiring in the dusk of some tulips that had went to me the evening before by a lady. Among them were some tulips, and in a out of them, they opened, few a bumblebee. A lazy, drowsy bee, that had gone to sleep in this way, as the flower was closing for the night, or, perhaps, had done a day's work for the sweet honey, and just at night was so sleepy that he staid in the tulip to go to sleep and so was shut in. A very elegant bed he had that night. I wonder if he dreamed of the fine honey he would have done if he had been in his homely nest? The pretty lily closes its pretty green leaves at night as it lies upon its watery bed for it unfolds them again in the morning. How beautiful it looks as it is spread out upon the water in the sunlight! The little morning glory is among the flowers that close at night, but it is as bright as ever its slender stem when it wakes in the morning. When it shuts itself up it is a little green ball, and looks something like a pea. But look the next morning, and the ball is opened, and shows a golden tuft within a silver crown.

The golden flowers of the dandelion are shut up every night. They are folded up so closely in their green coverings that they look like buds that have never yet been opened. There is one curious habit which the dandelion has. When the sun is very hot it closes itself up to keep from wilting. It is in this way sheltered in its green covering from the sun. It sometimes, when it is very hot, shut itself up even as early as 9 o'clock in the morning.

Some flowers hang down their heads at night as if they were nodding in sleep; but in the morning they lift their heads up again fresh and gay. Some flowers have a particular time to open. The evening primrose does not open till evening, and hence comes its name. The flower named four o'clock opens at that hour in the morning. There is a flower commonly called go-to-bed at noon, that always opens in the morning and shuts up at noon.

The Supreme Court of Illinois Enters a Ruling Against the Anarchists.

Spies, Schwab, Lingg, Fielden, Parsons, Fischer, and Engel to Be Hanged.

Their Counsel Will Take the Case to the United States Supreme Court.

How the Condemned Men Bear Themselves—Precautionary Measures Taken.

(Chicago special.)

Justice Magruder, for the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois, sitting at Ottawa, on Wednesday, affirmed the finding of the Criminal Court of Cook County, and thereby sentenced to death August Spies, Michael Schwab, Samuel Fielden, Albert R. Parsons, Adolph Fischer, George Engel, and Louis Lingg, found guilty of the murder of Police Officer Mathias J. Degan, during the same Rioting Oscar W. Neebe gets the penitentiary for fifteen years. The date of the execution is fixed for Nov. 11.

The crime grows out of the events of a dynamite bomb on the evening of May 4, at a meeting of the Anarchists, on Haymarket square, at which seven were killed and a number more injured. The evidence showed that the bomb was thrown, and that it was the cause of the murder of Degan. The jury in this case also threw any one of the defendants had a hand in the affair, but it was contended that no one of them actually committed the act, and the law is that they were accessories before the fact.

The defendants were tried in the first instance on the counts charging them with murder, and the jury found them guilty of murder, and fixed the penalty at death. If they convicted to accomplish such murder by concerted action the acts and declarations of any one of the parties to the conspiracy and in furtherance of the conspiracy, then, in the contemplation of law, the acts and declarations of all are the acts and declarations of each one of the conspirators. The question for the jury to decide, in the prosecution of such a conspiracy, is not, whether the conspiracy is proper so far as it may be a conspiracy to commit a crime, but whether the conspiracy charged against the defendants was in fact a conspiracy for the purpose of establishing the doctrine of Socialism, and the defendants as accessories to the crime of murder.

The jury have found the defendants guilty of murder, and have fixed the penalty at death, and it is not for us to say that the evidence does not sustain the verdict. The question before us is, Did the defendants, or some of them, do the acts and declarations charged in the indictment, and do those acts and declarations show that they were guilty of the crime of murder? If they did, they are guilty of murder, and the law is that they are guilty of murder, and the law is that they are guilty of murder, and the law is that

AT THE STAKE.

I came west when I was 17 years of age and old Red Taylor, of Georgetown, Col., (the other day), and now I'm a bit over 60. You can figure that up and see how long I've been skirmishing with Indians, grizzlies, panthers, rattlesnakes and the other pesky varmints of mountain, plain and prairie. There hasn't been an Indian war for the last half century but I haven't had a hand in, and I reckon I've had as many stand up fights on my own hook as any scout or hunter you can name. I have been captured and put to the torture twice, and been captured and got away without torture three or four times. In times of peace I have lived with the Pawnees, Kiowas, Apaches, Sioux, Cheyennes and Blackfeet, and in times of war I have fought all these tribes. Mebbe I am, therefore, a party good judge of Indian nature, and when you ask me which tribe of redskins has the most honor, I reply that I never yet saw an Indian man I would trust a rod. The only reason that some of 'em have served the government as scouts and traitors is because they happened to turn their own kind just then a little wuss than they did the white man. However, you want some of my own adventures, and I will give you one.

Before the days of railroads in the west a man who was spitin' for an Indian fight could get it within rifle shot of Fort Kearney, and this state of affairs continued up to 1866 and later. The last time I was captured was on the Smoky Hill fork of the Kansas river, and it was while the railroad was being pushed across the state of Kansas. A railroad brought the Indian country meant goodby to game and goodby to the Indian. The redskin realized this as forcibly as the white man, and he was on hand to fight the progress of the road. He was foolish enough to suppose that the killing off of a few scouts and surveyors would stop all work, and by the time the road was half way across the state of Kansas every Indian who had any patriotism about him was in front of it and doing battle. The contractors had to employ a great many scouts and fighters to protect the advance men, and I was one of those thus engaged. In the five months of my employment I killed thirty-nine Indians and brought thirty-nine scalps to camp, and there were other scouts who did as well, or better. We did not lose near as many men in proportion, as we fought entirely on the defensive, and had all the advantage.

My capture occurred one morning in September. One of the engineers of the road had been on a spree, and while raving on delirium tremens had left camp and wandered off. He had been gone two or three hours before he was missed, and at midnight of a rainy, gusty night my c. a stanted out on foot to hunt him up. As no one knew the direction he had taken, each of us went his own way. There were plenty of Indians around us, and a scout had been wounded that afternoon within half a mile of our camp. Each man of us who went out took big chances of being captured, but there was no hesitating or hanging back on the count. Our camp was close to the river, and my first move was to cross the stream. The water was no more than waist deep, and I had no trouble in reaching the other bank. The engineer, whose name was Sewell, had gone off in his shirt and trousers and socks. He was boneheaded, out of his senses, and had no weapons of any sort. My only hope in finding him was that he would become exhausted before going far, and sit down.

Once across the stream, I held to the north for about a mile, and then turned to the left and began a circle that I described a quarter of a circle and come to the river again. I then went back to the starting point and here to the right, and it was while on my way to the river that four Indians suddenly rose up from the grass at my feet and seized me. I can't say that I was off my guard, but I did seem a bit quer to me as I thought it over afterward that I should have let the skunks get such an advantage of me. I could see fairly well for twenty feet or more around me, but the fellows had crept to within six closely, and I happened to walk so straight into the trap that I was done for before I knew what was going on. Not a yell was uttered—not a word spoken. Two of them tripped me up, and the other piled on to me and disarmed me, and in less than a minute my arms were jerked behind me and made fast, and away we went to the northwest on a trot. This was maintained for about a mile, when we came upon a party of fifty mounted redskins, and in the midst of them I found Sewell. He was prostrate with exhaustion and fear, and when I spoke to him, which got the Indians seemed rather to encourage me, he began crying and sobbing like a child. I was lifted up behind a warrior and off he went at a gallop, riding to the west and keeping close to the river until we had made at least fifteen miles. Then we came upon an Indian village as it was growing daylight.

My feelings during that ride were anything but agreeable, I am sware you. The fact that I was not killed at the moment of my capture had a significance which I well understood. I was just as certain to go to the stake for torture as I remained a prisoner, and I did a heap of thinking in hopes to get a plan for escape. Mounted behind an Indian, my arms tied so tightly that I was a constant sufferer, and obliged to keep my balance by the use of my legs alone, there was no earthly show for me to carry out any scheme. Sewell was mounted on a fast horse just ahead of me, and his conduct went far to distress and unnerve me. He kept up a constant lamentation, and was continually beseeching me not to let the Indians do him harm. Drink had lost its effect on him, and to come out of his spell and find himself in the hands of the relentless redskins had taken all the pluck out of him. He was doing the very worst thing he could have done, for he heard the Indians gloating over the prospect when he should come to the stake. There was considerable hurrah when we rode into the village, and had I not been able to understand a word of the dialect, the looks and actions of the Indians would have been sufficient to tell me what fate they intended to mete out to us. Sewell was p'aced in one lodge and I in another, and the war party were soon engaged with breakfast. It was not yet fairly daylight when I was pulled off the horse, and therefore I had not yet been recognized. I was pretty generally known to all the tribes, and they had named me "The Long Death." I got the name by killing some of them with a rifle, which knocked them over when they supposed themselves far beyond range. My only hope was that no one in the crowd would be able to identify me, as I had lately had my hair cut close and my whiskers entirely removed, but daylight had only come when three warriors looked in on me, gave a start of surprise, and one of them called at the top of his voice—

"It is the Long Death! We have got him at last. Here is the white hunter who has killed so many of our people."

The cut was out of the bag, as the old saying goes, and I stood there and faced them and knew that I was doomed to the most horrible torture they could invent.

They did not keep me long in waiting. The knowledge of my identity wheetled their savage appetites, and while the warriors who captured me were eating breakfast the rest of the village was astir with preparations. The camp was in a bit of valley on the left bank of Smoky Hill Fork, and two young trees were cut down, trimmed to a proper length, and then driven into the ground in the center of the village. The one intended for me was almost in front of my tepee, and I stood at the entrance and saw the young man drive it into the earth. More than that, I sung out to them in a steady voice, in their own dialect:

"A stake like that to hold the Long Death! You shall see how he will tear it up!

My words were received with shouts of satisfaction. No people on earth respect courage in a man as much as the Indians. They are no less cruel to a game man, but his pluckness will shorten his torture. Feeling that my time had come, and trying to provide some of them to shot or tomahawk me, I called out the names of half a dozen of the tribe whom I had sent to the happy hunting grounds. Some of the young men fairly raved to get at me, but the order of the chief was to wait. I boasted that I could outshoot, outride and outrun their best men, and offered to fight any six of them. If they would turn me loose, but all this talk only gave them the more satisfaction in thinking of the torture in store for me. On the same principle that people cut their pie last, the Indians led Sewell out first. His condition was such that but little fun could be made out of him. Some of the young men, a large, fine looking man, but the result of his curse and of his capture was to break him down. He had no more courage than a child, and it was pitiful to see him weep and hear his lamentations. I begged of the Indians to let him go, stating that he was a civilian who had never injured them, and was so broken down that he could not live long, and but for the hotheaded young men in the tribe I should have got him off. They urged that he was assisting to build the railroad which was driving the game and the Indian out of the country, and that the white men never spared a warrior because he was ill. Sewell was then sled off, and the engineer was led out, stripped of his clothing, and tied securely to the stake. I had refused to look on at first, but I now felt that I would have been taken as an act of cowardice on my part. Realizing this, I stepped outside the lodge and stood within ten feet of the stake. Seven young men and boys had been made fast, but when they stepped back he suddenly grew calm and asked for a pipe.

"Taylor, what does this all mean? What are they going to do with me?"

"They are going to torture you, Mr. Sewell.

"Are you a prisoner, too?"

"Yes, and they will torture me after finishing you."

"My God! but this is awful. I have $900 at the camp. Won't they take that as a ransom off?"

I replied that if we were worth a million dollars apiece we could not purchase our liberty under the circumstances, and advised him to call up all his courage and try to die like a man. Any sign of weakness on his part would excite contempt and increased torture, and the better way was to defy them to do their worst. I believe he tried his best to brace up, but his nerves were dreadfully shattered, and after three or four minutes he began crying again. This had just its effect I predicted. Half a hundred boys were sent off to cut switches, and when they returned they were told to go ahead and apply them to the engineer. The idea was to whip some courage into him, but it was a flat failure. Almost at the first cut the man cried out like a woman, and, his feet not having yet been tied, he danced about like a puppet. I felt like running in to kick his tormentors, but he paid no heed to my voice, and early part of the whole affair I had lost all control over him. Sewell was then led out and dashed with his knife he fell back to give place to another. This second one meant to do fine work. He meant, as a first thought, to cut the victim's tongue out, but as he reached for it with his left hand Sewell snapped at him like a dog, got the black hand firmly between his jaws, and then there was a grand uproar. Everybody enjoyed the fix the Indian was in, and we nearly lost sight of the fun by jaw, and then the Indian had to shoot to him to give the victim fair play. Sewell held on for fully five minutes, lacerating the hand like a bulldog, and then three or four warriors seized him and could not let go. The bitten warrior relinquished the knife to another, and drawing the root quarter of an hour Sewell suffered the loss of his nose, ears, fingers and lips. He shrieked out in agony when his nose was sliced off, but after that he never even grunted, and I consoled myself with the hope that he was dead. The Indians finally became satisfied that they could get no more "fun" out of him, and he was scalped, and the faggots at his feet were lighted to consume the body.

My time had come. There was a grand yell from every warrior as the two guards led me to the stake. How did I feel? Well, I was recklessly desperate. I hated to go without having revenge on some of them, and, as there was no other way, I gave them a tongue lashing. I called them women and cowards. I cited fistitious cases, when one hunter had licked six of them; I dared and defied them to do their worst. I had them worked up until they fairly danced with rage at my howl, and I reasoned that the torture would not last long. I was stripped of every vestige of clothing, bound hand and foot to the stake, and, as the sun came out hot, the white men never spared a warrior because he was ill. Such talk as this settled it, and the engineer was led out, stripped of his clothing, and tied securely to the stake. I had refused to look on at first, but I felt that I would have been taken as an act of cowardice on my part. Realizing this, I stepped outside the lodge and stood within ten feet of the stake. COERCION'S CRUEL VERDICT.

William O'Brien Found Guilty and Sentenced to Imprisonment for Three Months.

THE trial of Mr. William O'Brien, under the coercion act, was resumed at Mitchelstown on Saturday, says a Dublin dispatch. The accused was found guilty and sentenced to three months' imprisonment. Notice of appeal from the judgment of the Court was given. Mr. O'Brien, addressing the Court in his defense, said the crown was guilty of having suppressed evidence favorable to him. The crown had wished, for instance, the notes made by the local Constable of the defendants speech, but these notes, he said, was recorded his statement that the Irish party would give the land bill fair play. Continuing, Mr. O'Brien justified his defense of the Kingstown tenants on the ground that the evictions against them were commenced just on the eve of the passage of the land bill, and that an attempt was made to defraud the poor, wretched tenants of the benefits of the measure. He admitted that he had advised the tenants to resist the evictions at Kingstown, but that he had declared that, before God and man, they were justified in defending their homes. Dunsany's and other sentences had been pronounced against Mr. O'Brien on the first charge he was placed on trial on the second charge. This was of the same nature as the other. Upon this he was also found guilty, and was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, the term to be concurrent with the first. Mr. O'Brien appealed from both judgments, and was liberated on bail.

THE DYNAMITE GUN.

Secretary Whitney Greatly Impressed with the Value of the New Ship Destroyer.

SECRETARY WHITNEY is pleased with the result of the dynamite gun experiment. A Washington dispatch reports him as saying:

The experiment was most successful. Secretary Chandler, Admiral Jenkins and myself, I frankly admit, had been incredulous, fully confess that I was greatly impressed with the power of the explosion. The vessel was lifted bodily and then went out of sight instantly. The weakness of that target was evidently no measure of the power of the projectile. A shell from the gun will be found to explode with quite as destructive quantities as into and a quarter off with considerable accuracy, and it is a matter of detail merely to increase the range of the gun and the quantity of the explosive to be employed. The projectile is made of the strongest iron-clads, and the explosive used is the same as employed in torpedoes and machine guns. The method now employed for using high explosives is in torpedoes. Torpedoes are met with machine guns and mines are placed about the ships, but this pneumatic gun is a new method of attack. Taking its range and the line of flight of the projectile, it is difficult to say how far it will be effective, but I believe it will be the most important gun yet invented. Its usefulness on ships is yet to be established, but its importance in naval and land warfare as an arm can not be overestimated.

Great Britain and Venezuela.

THE raising of the English man-of-war Pylades for La Guayra to demand indemnity from the Venezuelan Government for the detention of the schooners Josephine and Hermiretta is interpreted in New York as an indication that Great Britain's intentions toward the South American republic are warlike. The Consul General of Venezuela at New York regards the situation as critical, and says his Government depends upon the United States to defend it against English encroachments. He explains that the schooners were detained for non-compliance with the customs regulations, and claims that England's real object is to gain control of the Orinoco river.

MRS. PARSONS ARRESTED.

LUCY E. PARSONS, wife of the condemned anarchist, was arrested on Fifth avenue, Chicago, while in the act of distributing copies of her husband's "address to the American people" to the passers-by. The arrest was made under the ordinance prohibiting the distribution of handbills, circulars, etc., in the streets. Mrs. Parsons was locked up, but was shortly released upon a deposit of $25 by the business manager of the Arbeiter Zeitung for her appearance next morning.

Sparks from the Wires.

GENERAL PATOU says it has not yet been decided to what justice of the Supreme Court the application for a writ of error in the anarchists cases will be made.

LEADING members of the Sioux nation in Dakota have petitioned the President to take the order of the commissioner of Indian affairs forbidding instruction in the Indian schools in any but the English language.

THE EASTERN STATES.

GEORGE SCHELLING, chairman of the Anarchist defense fund, called upon Gen. Roger Pryor at New York, for the purpose of employing him to present the case to the United States Supreme Court. Gen. Pryor has reserved his decision until he can examine the transcript.

A NUMBER of leading bankers and merchants of New York City have been interviewed in regard to the stringency in the money market. The preponderance of opinion is that Congress is responsible for the present state of affairs. While some think the Secretary of the Treasury should relieve the pressure by liberal purchases of bonds, all unite in the belief that Congress, at its next session, should reduce taxation. The merchants seem to be suffering for money even more than the Wall street speculators.

A PITTSBURGH dispatch states that a mammoth nail company, to be composed of all the large nail manufacturers in the United States, is about to be formed.

A Pittsburgh dispatch of Saturday says:

Asiatic cholera was brought to this port yesterday by the steamship Alesia, which sailed from the cholera-infected ports of Italy. Six cases in the steerage have been reported, and death was the sure result in each case. The Alesia left the port of Naples on Sept. 4. When nine days out from that port the first case, that of Luiga Marii, a steerage passenger, was discovered by the ship's crew. He lingered along for three days in great agony, when he died. Two days later Giovanni Andante, another steerage passenger, died of the same plague. Both were promptly buried at sea. Four days thence another every day until the ship arrived in port a death occurred, and all received the same burial. The last three eight deaths in all. When the Alesia arrived at Quarantine Health Officer Smith boarded her and learned these facts. He also found that the ship's surgeon had diagnosed four other cases of steerage passengers with the same disease. The general agent of the Italian line, Signor Antonio Zerega, was notified, and the Quarantine Commissioners, Mr. Kalle, and E. S. Mellen, Secretary of the Quarantine Commission, at once proceeded to Quarantine. An extended examination by Health Officer Smith and the Board of Health of four additional cases found which proved to be cholera died during the day. The ship was at once ordered down to the lower bay. The sick were conveyed to the hospitals on Swinburne's Island, and the remainder of the 861 steerage passengers were transferred to the hospital at Hoffman Island. The steerage passengers, 861 in number, together with the forty-two attending members of the crew, were also transferred to Hoffman Island by the Castle Garden transfer boat. Of the sick ones, three were children, and their time mothers were with their babes weeping violently.

THE WESTERN STATES.

TWO PASSENGER trains on the Ft. Wayne Railroad collided near Fremont, Ohio, with the loss of a dozen lives in one of the cars. The wreck caught fire and ten loaded cars were destroyed. Fireman Baugh was killed and Engineer Lyons badly injured.

CAPTAIN BLACK, chief counsel for the anarchists, applied to the Illinois Supreme Court at Ottawa for leave to withdraw the record of the case from the files for thirty days. The application was denied. A transcript cost about $4,000. Gen. Roger A. Pryor, of New York, has been retained to present the case to the United States Supreme Court.

PRESIDENT FAY, of the Nevada Bank, asserts that Sather Blood nor Mackey knew anything about its connection with the great wheat deal until told of it by Bradner, the late manager. The bank's loss was between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000.

THE George Weber Brewing Company, of Cincinnati, has made an assignment, with $500,000 liabilities and $350,000 assets. Preferences for a large amount were given.

CHICAGO elevators contain 5,195,389 bushels of wheat, 2,348,807 bushels of corn, 1,200,147 bushels of oats, 57,112 bushels of rye, and 164,292 bushels of barley; total, 8,966,857 bushels of all kinds of grain, against 16,604,055 bushels a year ago.

THE Bee Line limited, running between Mattoon and Indianapolis, met with an accident at Fern, Ind., in which the engine was overturned and Fireman Dodge, of Mattoon, and the fireman, Bodington's son, were killed.

JAMES DOLAN and William Banks got drunk and went to sleep on the Lake Shore track near Detroit. They were run over by a freight train, and instantly killed.

Springfield (Ill.) dispatch: "Letters from anarchists and sympathizers with anarchists have begun again to pour in upon the Governor, and his mail is daily laden with appeals in behalf of the condemned Chicago anarchists. One frantic appeal beseeches executive clemency 'for the sake of God and humanity.' Immediately after the sentence of Judge Gary's Court those letters began to flow to the Governor's office, but ceased entirely during the consideration of the judgment by the Supreme Court. Those coming now are from distant points. None has come from Chicago."

ANARCHIST PARSONS has issued a long address to the American people, in which he attempts to show that he was convicted on speeches that he never made and articles he never wrote. He vents his liberty or death, preferring the execution of the full force of his sentence to commutation. In closing he says:

I am prepared to die. I am ready if needs be to lay down my life for my rights and the rights of my fellow-men, and I shall do so with a calm and improved conscience. Therefore I cannot countenance or accept the efforts of those who will endeavor to procure a commutation of my sentence to an imprisonment for life. Imprisonment for life is the power of any tyrannical government, to which I do not owe allegiance, to be all alike—the agent of the privileged class to perpetuate their power, to oppress and plunder the toiling masses. At between capital and the legal rights of labor and its rights the courts of law, which are the tools of the capitalists, will side with them in the end. Life in the approved wage slave to his capitalistic master for life is a miserable life, a life of mental degradation, and death. If I had never been an anarchist before, my experience of courts and the laws of capitalistic tools would have made me one. Yes, I am an anarchist. I have not been proved guilty. I have to-day to decide from the record (kept as to my guilt or innocence) I cannot, therefore, accept a commutation to imprisonment. I appeal not for mercy, but for justice.

LOUIS LINGG, one of the convicted Chicago anarchists, has written a letter to Moses New York paper in which the defiance and bravado exhibited by him in court are well maintained. It is indorsed by Engel. In full it is as follows:

FRIENDS AND COMRADES: The exertions of our friends and comrades in general, and especially by the Defense Association, to appeal our case to the United States Supreme Court, makes it necessary for me, in the interest of the cause of my political friends, to abandon all hope of a fair trial. I should consider the working people in general, and the United States in particular, as the United States Supreme Court of Capitalism, if I should consider the working people in general, and the United States in particular, as the United States Supreme Court of Capitalism, the Meeting, and law tyranny in order to open the eyes of the American people as to the kind of a Government they have. I, for myself, should any one barter the notion that I expect the American people to do their political duty, or even that I hold for political purposes let him remove that illusion at once. I am the more bound, I wish to correct the mistaken supposition that prevails in certain badly informed circles, that I, in the name of our Chicago comrades to plead for mercy. Mercy! Mercy! Mercy!

THE JOURNAL

CHAS. J. GRIER, EDITOR.

CHARLEVOIX. - - MICHIGAN.

TheDetroit Evening Journal company announces that $100 will be paid by them to the heirs of any person killed in any railway accident in the United States or Canada, who shall have on their person at the time of death a copy of the Evening Journal of that day or of the previous day. In these days of frequent disaster, this scheme ought to boom the Journal's circulation.

THE Chicago Herald has recently doubled its size without any apparent decrease in the high standard of excellence of matter, and without increase of price. The Herald has always been a model of typographic beauty, thoroughly independent in tone, and one that every man could read and recommend to his neighbor, and we are glad to know that their prosperity warrants the enlargement.

The daily reports of President Cleveland's cordial reception by the people wherever his train stops are an all sufficient answer to the sneers of the partisan malignants who see in the trip all sorts of subtle schemes and devices to capture a renomination. There was no need of such a trip for any such purpose. It has long been a foregone conclusion that President Cleveland could have a renomination if he wished it or would accept it. There is not and never has been any good reason for supposing that his journey has any other purpose than the frankly avowed one, of seeing more of the country which honored the distinguished traveler by selecting him for the chief place in the nation.—Free Press.

Disaster and Death.

The storm on the northern lakes Monday and Tuesday was the most severe of the season, and promises to foot up in loss of life and property equal to or in excess of any previous year for a number of years.

On Monday night the schooner City of Green Bay, with iron ore, from Escanaba to St. Joseph, went ashore at South Haven and but one man was saved of a crew of seven.

While trying to give assistance to the crew Capt. Cross of the life-saving crew, had three ribs broken by being thrown against the side of the boat.

On the same night, the schooner Havana, with iron ore, same as above went down in fifty feet of water, five miles north of St. Joseph. The captain, cook and one seaman went down with the boat.

Both boats belonged to A. P. Ried of Kenosha, Wis.

At Buffalo the barge C. L. Hutchinson, with 350,000 feet of lumber from Alpena broke in two, and is a total loss.

The Candian steam barge Albion and schooner Ark went ashore Monday at Grindstone City.

The schooner Anna P. Grover went ashore at Port Hope, but was rescued by tug Crusader.

The canadian propeller, California, from Chicago to Montreal, foundered near St Helena island at one o'clock Tuesday morning. She had labored in the sea from 5:00 o'clock Monday morning until 11.00 at night, when the gangways were stove in, and the water in the hold put out the fires. After that hour she drifted helplessly, the wind blowing a hurricane, until near St. Helena when she suddenly listed to starboard and began to sink. Before the crew and passengers could get into the boats she went down, leaving them struggling among the waves and wreckage. The lost are:—Xavier Dant, deck hand. William Lough and Harry Smith, firemen. A. Connerton, passenger; Ella Pappa, stewardess; Arthur Hazzard, cabin boy; Robert Grant, mess-room boy; George Foley, purser; one young lady passenger. The saved are: A. G. Hankins, watchman; Owen Ronke, wheelman; Peter McManus, William Brown, W. Charlebois, Joseph Nelson, J. C. Ives, deckhands; Peter Legault, mate; A. Bonnet, wheelsman; Paul Coattawean and Joseph Lojean, deckhands; Capt. J. Y. Trowell, James Ellis and Samuel Mills, engineers; Mrs. Bloud, cook; Mrs. Connerton, passenger. The cargo consisted of 20,000 bushels of corn, 600 barrels of pork, and a small amount of general merchandise; the whole valued at about $20,000. The grain is insured for $11,600 in the Western Assurance, of Toronto, and the pork for $3,500 in the Boston Marine. The California was built at Hamilton in 1873, measured 586 tons and rated A2. She was owed by Crandell & Yeddes, valued at $27,000, and insured for $21,000, chiefly in Canadian companies.

A special to the Free Press from Glen Haven on the 4th says: The schooner Walhalla dragged her anchor and is close to shore in the bay and is pounding some. The schooner Arctic is high and dry. She sprung a leak and the captain beached her. Both are light. The schooner Pulaski, of Toledo, loaded with coal for Manitowoc, is ashore in Good Harbor bay.

A large number of other disasters are reported, but none attended with loss of life.

Pensions and the Grand Army.

When the Grand Army of the Republic met at San Francisco the endorsement of the organization was sought for the dependent pension bill, a measure since vetoed by President Cleveland. The effort failed. The republic was already disbursing $89,000,000 annually for pensions, and upon the rolls were found the names of all surviving veterans who had been wounded or had contracted disease in the army. The legislation favorable to the soldier had been of unprecedented liberality, and self-respecting soldiers were unwilling to appear in the light of mendicants or to put the sordid value upon their sevices, implied in the demand, that twenty-five years after the war, their connection with which they celebrated as honorable and praiseworthy, the government should make stipendaries of all of them regardless of length of service or its real value.

This was a manly and patriotic precedent. Yet it does not prevent the attempt at St. Louis to gain the indorsement of the Grand Army to still other plans of plunder in the name of patriotic service rendered almost a generation ago. Stimulated by claim agents, certain members of the organization, camp followers and looters, who, had the president approved the vicious dependent pension bill, would have loaded him as a patriot, are engaged in denunciation of him for an act, which, were he a demagogue he would never have done, and in working up sentiment to be utilized in committing the Grand Army to a reversal of the honorable position assumed at San Francisco. Had they succeeded, proof of the degeneracy of the organization would have been furnished, but they stopped short of the plan of poisoning for mere service, going, however, great lengths in that direction by advocacy of the so-called dependent bill.—Chicago Herald.

Michigan Mention

Fifteen marriage licenses were issued by the Wayne county clerk on the first day of the operation of the license law.

The Marquette Mining Journal has just received a full cargoad of paper, 25,000 pounds, the largest order for paper ever given by an upper peninsula printing establishmrnt.

Alva Haywood, the impersonator, recently with the Anna Berger concert company, is now organizing a new company at Battle Creek, to play Gilbert's comedy, "Sweethearts," in connection with musical specialties.

It has been suggested that if the British yachtsman really want that cup which they have been trying to get for so many years they should arrange a slow race and secure the coveted utensil by coming in last. They would then be sure to win.

The G. R. & I. railroad company, always foremost in advancing the interests of Northern Michigan, is now contemplating laying a cable from Mackinac City to Mackinac Island next summer, and are investigating the merits of different kinds of cables. —Petoskey Independent.

By a joint resolution of the Michigan legislature of 1885, the sum of $10,000 was appropriated to place a statue of Lewis Cass in the capitol at Washington. Each state is entitled to place in the national gallery of statuary the statues of two of her citizens, and up to this time Michigan had not claimed its rights. The commissioner appointed to procure such statue, decided that it should be seven feet in height and to be cut from the best and purest white Italian marble. The model was made in Paris, and has been approved by the commissioner.

Restored by Magic.—Has the lake air and wind spoiled your complexion? Do you long for a preparation that will completely remove the moth, tan and pimples, and leave the skin clear and soft? If so you have but to buy a bottle of Hamilton's Oriental Balm which is simply magical in the effect and perfectly harmless. It is used in all the best families and gives unbounded satisfaction. Price 50 cents per bottle. Sold by G. W. Crouter.

A VERY SINGULAR RIVER.

An Anomaly in Nature—But Little Changed Since the Day of Its Birth.

As I said, I know know not what to call this Saguenay. Rivers have banks, but it has none; for lofty and precipitous cliffs, mountains of rock, precipices that rise 1,000 feet sheer upward from the tide and beetling crags—these cannot, without misuse of language, be called river banks. Nor is it fit to call it a stream, for a stream is a line of flowing water smaller than a river, and the Saguenay is one from mouth and a half to two miles wide, and from 400 to 1,000 feet in depth, and all this monstrous depth of water is in motion. Nor is it an outlet merely, for into it flows the surplus water of Lake St. John. But this lake is shallow, not deep, and but little more than half the length of the Saguenay, and hence its flowage, large as it is, is but a tithe, nay, only a hundredth part of what the latter holds and pours into the St. Lawrence daily. Hence, if we call the Saguenay a river, it is not because that word describes it or is a proper title to it, but because of its strange characteristics. It stands an anomaly in nature, and there is no better name to give it than to call it a river.

Its waters are colored, nor is their color like to any other river I have ever seen. They have been called black by many writers who have written of them, but they are not black, but rather a transparent brown, like as common water is when looked at through a smoked glass. I say transparent, for they are very pure and clear, and, dark as they are, the eye sees deeply and easily into them. A white stone or piece of tin can be perceived at a great depth—as deeply down as they might be in the waters of the Horicon, which I have often thought were the purest and the clearest in the world. Moreover, the sunlessness penetrates its dark brown currents easily, and the long lanes of light shot into the brown depths by the solar rays look as the sunlight looks when shining through the stained windows of great cathedrals.

Whence its waters get this strange quality, this imperceptably gloomy and sinister usage, none can say, and savants do not even pretend to guess, for all the currents which flow into it are mountain streams and crystalline, and the contributions of the sea which the tidal lift pours into it are clear and blue of tint. Nor can it come from any coloring matter imbibed by nature's chemistry acting upon its rocky walls and bottom, for the nature of these is known, and gleiss and quartz and gneiss are the dominant structures. But whatever be the cause of it, the color of its waters is, as I have described, a brown, with almost a purple tinge, and has to the eye, seen from a distance, a most gruesome look, gloomy and sinister, as if it came from some other world than ours, whose waters, unless discolored from causes discoverable to us, are pure and sparkling.

Imagine, now, a vast volume of this strange looking water, two miles in width, 1,000 feet in depth, pouring out between a monstrous opening between contiguous mountains, unable by some mighty throe of nature, travailing in agony to bring forth an awful birth; an opening which is not simply a rent made through a lofty range, but as if a long, high ridge of primeval rock—rock old as the beginning of the world—running north and south, had been split apart along its entire length of forty miles, exactly in the center, and the two halves wedged violently apart until the jagged, precipitous, cavernous sides stood two miles asunder, and through this tremendous opening, through the very center of this huge ridge of rock, a vast, deep, almost fathomless volume of gloomy colored water began to flow, and you have in your mind's fairly good picture of what the Saguenay was at its birth, and what it is today.

For of all rivers on the globe this, from necessity, has changed the least. Here and there the frost and heat, the snows and rains of 10,000 years have worn down the sharp edges and rounded the flinty verge of overhanging precipices; here and there the wash and wear of centuries have deposited so much of soil that trees can find a foothold, but save this all is today as either hand, as you sail up its darkling tide, as it was when first born in nature's darkest hour and strangest agony, its gloomy currents began to boil and whirl and flow. Every other river on the face of the earth has changed its banks and bed, but this strange river has changed not at all, and cannot change until the end of time.—W. H. H. Murray in New York World.

Our Exact Geographical Center.

An army officer now in Chicago asked the other day: "Do you know where the exact geographical center of the United States is? Never thought anything about it, probably? Well, it's marked by a grave—that of Maj. Ogden, of the United States army, who died at Fort Riley, in Kansas, in 1855, during the cholera epidemic of that year. Maj. Ogden's remains were afterward removed to Fort Leavenworth and buried in the National cemetery there, but his monument still stands on a knoll a little to the northeast of the post—Fort Riley—and it lifts its head toward the clouds in the exact geographical center of the United States. This isn't a conceit; it's a fact, though probably of the hundreds of men now at the fort not one in a hundred ever stops to think about it. Fort Riley is a few miles east of Junction City, Kan., and is one of the most important cavalry posts in the country."—Chicago Tribune.

About Sea Captains.

A recently returned European tells the following story of Capt. Cook, the commander of the Umbria, now the fastest Cunarder. The captain was taking a midday observation while the sun was somewhat hidden by mist. As he was putting down his instrument a passenger said to him: "The fog prevented you from getting an observation, didn't it, captain?" "It did not prevent you from making your observation," said the captain, as he went toward the chart room. The anecdote will be appreciated by those who have crossed the ocean with Capt. Cook. A thorough seaman, attentive to duty night and day, he is not known to travelers as a social captain. There is a wide difference in those sea dogs in this respect.—Chicago Times.

The only chair of sanitary engineering said to exist is at the Imperial University of Japan. It is under royal patronage.

Those Village Taxes.

Our item last week in regard to the village taxes stirred up quite a muss before the paper had been on the streets one hour. Numerous citizens who had not paid their taxes, vowed they would not pay a cent; some of the councilmen felt aggrieved; and this week the Sentinel slanders all over a half column, trying to prove that the JOURNAL's statement was incorrect, and that Charlevoix's taxes are unusually light. At a special meeting last Saturday night the village council took decisive action in the matter, by instructing the finance committee to make a list of property delinquent for taxes of 1884 and 1885 and advertise the same for sale according to law. So it will be seen that the item was productive of good to this extent, and we can further assure those who have not paid their taxes that the council don't propose to let any man escape.

Shipments.

The following are the shipments from the port of Charlevoix, reported for the week ending Wednesday evening:

Sept. 29—Schr. Fleetwing, 18 cords slabs, and 20,000 feet hardwood lumber, Pine Lake Lumber Co., to Michigan City.

29—Schr. Jennie Mulholland, 200,000 feet hardwood lumber, A. T. Bobo & Co., to Chicago.

Oct. 4—Schr. Stampede, 290,000 feet hardwood lumber, Pine Lake Lumber Co., to Sheboygan, Wis.

4—Schr. Seil, 3,000 posts, 3,000 ties, Johnson & Co., to Milwaukee.

Give Them a Chance!

That is to say, your lungs. Also all your breathing machinery. Very wonderful machinery it is. Not only the larger air-passages, but the thousands of little tubes and cavities leading from them.

When these are clogged and choked with matter which ought not be there, your lungs cannot half do their work. And what they do, they cannot do well.

Call it cold, cough, croup, pneumonia, catarrh, consumption, or any of the family of throat and lung diseases, and lung obstructions, all are bad. All ought to be got rid of. There is just one way to get rid of them. That is to take Boschee's German syrup, which any druggist will sell you at 75 cents a bottle. Even if everything else has failed you, you may depend upon this for certain.

Don't Experiment.

You cannot afford to waste time in experimenting when your lungs are in danger. Consumption always seems at first only a cold. Do not permit any dealer to impose upon you with some cheap imitation of Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption coughs and colds, but be sure you get the genuine. Because he can make more profit he may tell you he has something just as good or just the same. Don't be deceived but insist upon getting Dr. King's New Discovery which is guaranteed to give relief in all throat, lung, and chest affections. Trial Bottles free at Dr. G. W Crouter's.

No Scrofula can be so deep-seated or so malignant and stubborn that Purkod's Blood Purifier will not be found helpful. It will effect a cure if cure be possible. And if you are troubled with Boils, Salt-Rheum, Pimples, Rough Skin, or any humor whatever, just give the Purifier a thorough trial and you cannot fail to receive benefit from it. Price $1 per bottle. Sold by Dr. G. W. Crouter.

The directors of the D. C. & E. R. R. Co., are in session to-day, and in answer to a request for news we were assured that everything is progressing as favorably and rapidly as possible; that the surveying party are making good progress and report an easy route toward the straits; and that active work on the roadbed will begin just as soon as possible and have everything done legally. The company aim to do their work so carefully that no time will be lost by having to do it over again. The general feeling is that active work of construction will be begun this fall before snow flies.

The supervising board of jail inspectors, consisting of the judge of probate, chairman, the superintendents of the poor, and the county agent of the state board of corrections and charities, met on Tuesday and examined the jail and will recommend to the board of supervisors that a more adequate provision be made for prisoners, which in effect, means a new jail. The recommendation will hardly be considered favorably by the board of supervisors, for, while the jail does not provide suitable separation of the sexes and older and younger offenders, there are two other good jails in the county to which offenders may be sent at the discretion of the Judge.—Citizen.

SUNSHINE.

BY MARY B. T. MATUS.

I set up before my sunshine
That is poured around our way,
And keep it safely bemasked
For some bitter, rainy day.
For the days that are a-dreary
Then can scatter the blessed sunshine
Which I have kept in hiding hidden
And place it full in view.

"Though we scarce can see it glimmer
Through our failing, bitter tears
Yet it will shine out clearer and clearer
Then have been so dear for years
Though friends do wound us sorely
Tis doubtful most of all.
Let us brush aside the tendrops,
And not let another fall.

O, the sunshine, how it glistens
In its crying green wall!
There is health and joys unnumbered,
And hopes that never fail.
There are days of quiet beauty
That live through all the year
There are opened golden gates
That are ever open for us.
And the best of all this sunshine
Are the hopes we have for them;
They will never, never darken,
Tis a sunshine that lasts
O, we're lots of bottled sunshine,
And 'twill last throughout the year,
God has poured it all around us
So no day need lack of cheer.

DISINHERITED

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

Our brief tale begins with a moral or, rather, it illustrates a truth which is coeval with human experience. The truth, honorable to humanity, but none the more remarkable, that loving and devoted women will cling to unworthy men long after the world has hopelessly given them up for lost. We cite but one more example out of hundreds of thousands.

The sum announced by Everett Travis to his parents of his clandestine marriage with Julia Carter, one of the factory girls, was the cause of such an explosion of paternal wrath as does often really occur, outside the pages of romance.

The senior Travis glared on his son in the most highly approved style of sensational fiction.

"What! Married, do you say, and to one of those cotton-spinners? Well, by — sir, we'll make short work of this foolishness! Find how much she wants, and you can pay her off; then go out West and get a divorce, and let this be the last of your wild oats, sir! It's time you settled down and began life seriously and steadily.

"Sir, she's my lawful wife. She's good enough for any man in the State. I want to bring her here and have you and mother receive her as a daughter."

"I'm sure I'd be willing," put in Mrs. Travis, with a thought of the far-off days when she used to do kitchen-work for wages. "And I'm sure she must be good, and that we can love her dearly. Let Everett bring her here, father."

"Never, madam! Never, you undutiful son! We've sacrificed you enough. We educated you carefully and expensively; I've lavished money on you! I've spoiled you, perhaps. Anything reasonable I'll stand, but this is a step too far. I repudiate that creature, take the means I have suggested to get rid of her, or I repudiate you forever. Choose, now, between her and me, with all that I have to give you."

There could be no doubt what the choice would be at that time. In the flush of young love, with a temper low but fully inherited from this irate parent, and viewing the world through the roseate glasses of twenty-four, Everett Travis left his father's house, content to sacrifice his worldly prospects and advantages for the woman who was all in all to him.

He lost no time in attempts at reconciliation, but removed at once to a flourishing Western city. Stories were told, probably true ones, of a stealthy visit by Everett's mother before the removal; of her forgiveness and blessing to the fair young bride; of a welcome gift of money from the same kind hand, and of her promise to try and soften the stern father, and to write often. So they went to their new home.

No letters were received from the yearning mother. Her first attempt to write was detected by her husband, and so sternly forbidden that she never dared make the attempt afterward. But travelers going to Joliet from this village frequently carried substantial tokens of maternal affection to the disinherited.

Julia Carter had committed the common fault of woman in her marriage—she had taken counsel of the heart, and of nothing else. A handsome boyish face, a pleasant manner, assurances of unlimited devotion—these had captivated her; she had not dared to look beyond them. Had she looked beyond them she would have seen a character unformed, a frivolous disposition, a longing who had thus far proven the ability to do nothing but to spend his father's money, and whose capacity to earn bread for her was yet to be asserted. But then, she loved him; and what woman ever held any other arguments against that, where the man of her choice was concerned?

The years went by, and poor Julia became secretly convinced, by the hard logic of accomplished facts, that she had made a terrible mistake. She saw her fairy prince of a few years past, her idealized and daintily raised Everett, a failure in all that he undertook. She knew of his appealing by letter to his father for forgiveness and assistance, and she read the sarcastic refusal contained in the reply, with its sneering allusion to herself. She saw her husband become dissipated and degraded; she bore children, and followed them to the grave, when better treatment and more comforts would have saved them. She labored with her hands as she had never labored in the cotton-mill. She cleaved to that unworthy man in the worst of illfort, with a sublime faith and heroism which are only shown by women.

Time dulled even this desperate love. Years of practical childlessness produced their natural effect upon the father of Everett Travis. The barriers of pride and obstinacy were strong and high; but at last they yielded. A letter came to the poor Western home, informing the son that his mother was stricken with paralysis and likely to die. It implored him to return at once, bring his wife, and give repeated assurance that everything should be forgotten.

The answer, anxiously expected, was terse and unsatisfactory. It was written by Julia. She said that both her husband and herself were saddened by the intelligence of his mother's illness; that both wished to go at once to her, but that, alas! poor Everett could not write, and he had requested her to do so.

"Is that all?" asked the dying mother.

"Yes, Sophy; that's all."

"Oh, dear! I shall never see him again—my darling, my only child! Did you send them money to come, Timothy?"

"No," groaned the repentant father. "I didn't think of that."

"O, Timothy!"

"But I don't believe they'd come, anyway. It's a queer sick." "Why, what's the matter? Everett's mother was dead and buried, Mr. Travis resolved to go in person and look up his wayward son. A long railroad journey brought him to the city of his home, and with much difficulty he found his mean habitation. To the thin, careworn woman whom he found there, he introduced himself as Everett's father. She looked at him with stony eyes.

"I am his wife," she said. "You disowned him years ago on my account; now you have come too late to find him."

"He is not dead?" Mr. Travis cried.

"No; but if you persist in seeing him you will wish he was."

"Where is he? Take me to him."

"Beware, sir! I warn you. I say it is too late for your hard heart to be moved. You had better go back, and not insist on seeing him."

"I must see him."

She put on her battered bonnet and faded shawl, and without a word conducted him through busy streets to a gloomy and vast stone building. They walked through offices, halls, and courts and were stopped by a man at a strongly barred door.

"Do you want to look, Mrs. Travis?" the guard respectfully asked.

"Yes; do you look, too?"

He complied with her request. Through a wicket in the door that the guard unclosed some hundreds of men were seen marching across a large open court. Guards with muskets were posted about. The men wore matted and close-cropped hair and wore a coarse striped dress. Each man of the double-file had his right hand on the left shoulder of the man next in front of him. Among them Mr. Travis recognized his son.

"Why, what's all this?" he asked.

"You are in the State's Prison, sir," said Julia, coldly. "Yonder is your son—my husband. You repudiated him because he chose to marry me; he was not strong enough to be a man without your help—and there he is. I warned you, but you would come."

The old man's pride and coldness returned at once.

"What is he here for?" he asked.

"For a killing done in a drunken brawl. He is for life."

"Come away, then. I need never to hear his name again. Once more I disown him, but I will provide for you. The law will free you from him; he is civilly dead. Come home with me."

Poor, distressed, almost hopeless, she flashed such indignation upon him that he cowered away from her.

"He is my husband," she said. "You, his own father, may cast him away; I will never leave him. I know all you said of him and me when we were wedded. I saw the two letters you wrote him. He was your idol. You have shown—you are showing—how cheap a thing a father's love may be. I am his wife, I say; that is my answer."

He tried to put money in her hands, to tell her of a large check he would send her.

"I will burn it," she answered, and left him.

She went back to her loneliness and hard poverty.

But the result was what might easily be foreseen. The woman's faith, love, and endurance had their reward. In a few years Everett Travis was set free and came out from his hard discipline a man. The fallen idol was replaced upon its pedestal; the wife's fidelity was abundantly rewarded, and his father was glad to welcome him as his son and heir, with a worthy daughter.

The Last of the Jerseymen.

With pallid face and feverish limbs he tottered to the back porch of the house and somehow scaled a dreadful horn of warning, like the dying Roland when Charlemagne and all his peerage fell beneath Roncesvalles.

He was a mosquito.

And the swift-winged denizens of the bushes thronged around him.

"Fire-la," he murmured feebly, "my time is short, but I can still do you some service. Beware on beautiful city girl who sits gazing out upon the sea. I have tasted the rich blood of her cheek and behold, I die! It was Venetian red."

And he rolled over.

"I think Jersey is a much-abused place," said the musical rising from her chair. "I'm sure the mosquitoes haven't troubled me a bit."—Tid-Bits.

THE CONDEMNED REDS.

Justice Harlan Says the Cases Would Have Precedence on the Supreme Court Docket.

Friends of the Convicted Men Outside the Jail Disguised with Their Actions.

The Amnesty Association.

(Chicago special.)

The work of the Amnesty Association is largely directed to agitation among organized labor. There was a plan to appoint committees to go to all the meetings of labor-unions and Knights of Labor assemblies and urge the adoption of resolutions denouncing the decision of the Supreme Court against the anarchists. But as most of the members of the Amnesty Association are members of labor organizations that plan was abandoned for the understanding prevails that each member should work in his organization for the passage of such resolutions, and stir up his friends to do likewise in other bodies. As a result, resolutions of that character are submitted at almost every labor meeting, and in many cases the resolutions are adopted. Bakers' Union, No. 40, and Furniture-Workers' Union, No. 1, are the last that have adopted resolutions to the effect that organization simply indorsing a set of resolutions adopted by the Custom Tailors' Union last Saturday.

"It is enough to make anybody sick and disgusted," said one of the most prominent friends of the anarchists yesterday, "to see those fellows in jail behind the bars. Here we are spending our time and money and energy, and taking without a murmur all the odium cast upon us by a hostile press, in order to rescue those fellows the gallows, and in the meantime Parsons, Spies, and Fielden are spending their lives denouncing everybody, rejecting our efforts to get them a fair hearing before the Supreme Court, and abusing the men who try to get up a petition for their pardon. It's the silliest thing in the world for us, at the present time, and if it were not for the sake of justice I would drop the matter at once. It's no fun to do all this work and swallow all the abuse, and if our friends in whose behalf it is done discourage us in this way it makes it twice as hard." I can understand how some of their friends who are not in danger themselves can be impudent enough to indulge in wild talk. But those men themselves ought to have more sense."

Justice Harlan's Views.

(Washington telegram.)

Justice Harlan's attention was called to the recent interview with Justice Miller in which he intimated that the latter said that any act of error in the cases of the anarchists would ordinarily be made to Justice Harlan, Illinois being in the latter's circuit. Justice Harlan said he had no information that any application would be made. He was asked under what circumstances the trial cases could reach the Supreme Court of the United States from the State courts. He said, in reply, that he supposed any application for a writ of error to whatever Justice it should be made would be under Section 709 R. S., which provides among other things that "a final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of a State in which a decision in the suit could be had, where any title, right, privilege, or immunity is claimed under the Constitution or the treaties of the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege or immunity specially set up or claimed by either party under such Constitution, treaties, or statutes and reserved or affirmed in the highest court of a State may be brought to a writ of error." He also referred to Section 710, which provides that upon writ of error to review the judgment of the highest court of any criminal case brought by the defendant on the docket of all cases to which the Government is a party, except in cases which the court, in its discretion, declare to be of public importance, the judgment may be subject to any further order on the subject.

Denouncing the Sentence.

(Buffalo special.)

The Socialistic Congress, which has just concluded its sessions here, adopted the following:

The Congress of the Socialistic Labor party, assembled in Buffalo, although neither agreeing with the tactics nor with the principles of the anarchists, nevertheless declares the confirmation of the sentence of the Chicago anarchists to be a crime, to be inflicted by private revenge, premeditated, and to be an act of class injustice. If the prosecution of the Chicago men threw the bomb, and if, consequently, the death of the policeman was not developed so that we could, without violating our principles, call the killing of an unknown person; for it is a fact that even to-day nobody knows who threw the bomb, we cannot understand how it was possible to know the motive of the bomb-thrower, the motive of which it, if bomb was thrown, was, under the circumstances, impossible and would in all probability have not possibly injured the police and not illegally interfered for the purpose of disturbing the meeting. We are convinced that the destiny is an attack upon free speech, and that the act of the Chicago anarchists and that its execution would be political murder.

(Pittsburgh Dispatch.)

About seven hundred German socialists met in Turn Hall to protest against the hanging of the Chicago anarchists. On the stage was a red flag bordered with crape, and in the center were portraits of the doomed men. Resolutions declaring the sentence an attack upon labor and demanding a new trial were adopted.

(Cleveland dispatch.)

About two hundred and fifty anarchists met at a down-town hall and protested against the execution of the seven condemned Chicago anarchists. They spoke in German and were in favor of blood if everything else failed.

(Cincinnati dispatch.)

The socialistic faction of the Central Executive Committee of the Union Labor party to intercede in behalf of the Chicago anarchists. A vote was taken by wards and the request was refused by a large majority.

THERE was a shower of stones near Delores, in the volcanic region of the Argentine Republic, a few days ago, that lasted for more than a minute. The stones fell as thick as hail, and varied in size from a pebble to a very respectable bowlder. Great damage was done to trees, while barns and outhouses were demolished, many domestic animals killed, and large numbers of wild geese and hawks on the wing.

THE GREEN DIAMOND.

The League Base-ball Championship Drawing to a Close.

Pittsburgh Responsible for Chicago's Defeat This Year—Other Base-ball News.

[CHICAGO CORRESPONDENCE.]

The League championship race for the season of 1887 is now almost over, and that Detroit will take this year's pennant is now no longer doubted by any lover of base-ball. That, there is still considerable hope left in the camps of the New York and Philadelphia Clubs that success also is still to be fought for, and Manager James Mutrie, of the Giants, is so confident that his team will step over the heads of the White Stockings into second place as the veteran Harry Wright is that the Phillies will finish next to Detroit. Anson and President Spalding only smile, when asked if they can hold their present position, in a manner which indicates that they have absolutely no fear of being asked to do so. From present indications, the Detroits will win the pennant of 1887, but by a smaller percentage of games won than that trophy has been secured by for four years. The Detroits will probably finish the season with the loss of only about 40, which is much better from a good sporting point of view than the large winning percentage of the last three years. The Chicagos have made a good fight, and guess was, as will be seen by the following record of championship winners since the formation of the League:

		Won.	Lost.	Per cent.
1876	Chicago	52	14	.788
1877	Boston	31	17	.646

The poorest record made by any club in the history of the League was by the Cincinnatis in 1880, when they succeeded in winning but nine games during the whole season, losing 76. The Philadelphias did nearly as bad in 1883, when they won 17 and lost 63.

PITTSBURG IS RESPONSIBLE.

Big Jim McCormick and Corsica Abner Dalrymple, who played with Chicago last season, are now, as well known, playing with the Pittsburg League team, and as the end of the season approaches both of those players indulge in gains of quiet satisfaction as they look over the record of games won and lost this season. Why? Because, Jim and Abner feel that Pittsburg's work against Chicago, the White Stockings might now be on fighting terms with Detroit for the pennant.

It is a singular fact that one of the two clubs in the League beat Chicago out of the championship of 1887. So far as Chicago's fortune was concerned it was every club in the League, excepting only the new one in Pittsburg, who stood in the race. Anson's men have beaten the winning champions 10 out of 18 games in 1887, Detroit 12 of 19, the Giants 11 out of 17, Kelly's men 11 out of 18, Providence 12 out of 15, and the Hoosiers 10 out of 12. Doubtless the chances of the Chicago right, privilege, or immunity is claimed under the Constitution or the treaties of the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege or immunity specially set up or claimed by either party under such Constitution, treaties, or statutes and reserved or affirmed in the highest court of a State may be brought to a writ of error." He also referred to Section 710, which provides that upon writ of error to review the judgment of the highest court of any criminal case brought by the defendant on the docket of all cases to which the Government is a party, except in cases which the court, in its discretion, declare to be of public importance, the judgment may be subject to any further order on the subject.

Denouncing the Sentence.

The Socialistic Congress, which has just concluded its sessions here, adopted the following:

The Congress of the Socialistic Labor party, assembled in Buffalo, although neither agreeing with the tactics nor with the principles of the anarchists, nevertheless declares the confirmation of the sentence of the Chicago anarchists to be a crime, to be inflicted by private revenge, premeditated, and to be an act of class injustice. If the prosecution of the Chicago men threw the bomb, and if, consequently, the death of the policeman was not developed so that we could, without violating our principles, call the killing of an unknown person; for it is a fact that even to-day nobody knows who threw the bomb, we cannot understand how it was possible to know the motive of the bomb-thrower, the motive of which it, if bomb was thrown, was, under the circumstances, impossible and would in all probability have not possibly injured the police and not illegally interfered for the purpose of disturbing the meeting. We are convinced that the destiny is an attack upon free speech, and that the act of the Chicago anarchists and that its execution would be political murder.

(Pittsburgh Dispatch.)

About seven hundred German socialists met in Turn Hall to protest against the hanging of the Chicago anarchists. On the stage was a red flag bordered with crape, and in the center were portraits of the doomed men. Resolutions declaring the sentence an attack upon labor and demanding a new trial were adopted.

(Cleveland dispatch.)

About two hundred and fifty anarchists met at a down-town hall and protested against the execution of the seven condemned Chicago anarchists. They spoke in German and were in favor of blood if everything else failed.

(Cincinnati dispatch.)

The socialistic faction of the Central Executive Committee of the Union Labor party to intercede in behalf of the Chicago anarchists. A vote was taken by wards and the request was refused by a large majority.

THERE was a shower of stones near Delores, in the volcanic region of the Argentine Republic, a few days ago, that lasted for more than a minute. The stones fell as thick as hail, and varied in size from a pebble to a very respectable bowlder. Great damage was done to trees, while barns and outhouses were demolished, many domestic animals killed, and large numbers of wild geese and hawks on the wing.

George Francis Train's Awful Threat.

(New York correspondence.)

George Francis Train spoke for the first time in many years at Webster Hall Sunday evening in favor of the condemned Chicago anarchists. The proceeds of the admission fees charged were to go to the support of the men's families. Mr. Train said his presence was due to the infernal of four brave women—Mrs. W. F. Black, wife of one of the condemned anarchists; Mrs. Parsons, the mulatto wife of one of the convicts; Nina Van Zandt, who sat by proxy of August Spies; and Mrs. Col. Hinton. His speech was remarkably somewhat incoherent. Referring to the dynamite bomb, he said: "Dynamite, Mr. killing of the policemen in Chicago, Mr. Hinton, I wish you had fired all the bombs he could! And he been there. Confusion, he said:

"I'm sure a right to carry a pistol, and if any one attempts to take it away from me I'm prepared to shoot. All those in favor of that say aye. Now, I'm in favor of the Hay Market bomb-thrower. I'm in favor of the Hay Market bomb-thrower. I'm in favor of carrying a pistol, and

Importance of Careful Preparation of Soil in Wheat Culture—How to Save Seed Corn—A Staff That Insures Safety in Handling Bulls.

The subject of horns on cattle has been very much discussed of late, and it has been proven in many cases that they are expensive appendages. This is frequently demonstrated in the handling of bulls. It often occurs that even a pet bull will become enraged and inflict serious injuries when led only by a ring in the nose.

A BULL STAFF.

In the accompanying figure is shown a device vouched for by a Rural New Yorker correspondent, who claims that with it the handling of horned animals is comparatively safe. If the chain from any cause should come loose, a weapon of defense is still in the leader's hands. Take a long fork handle, rivet an iron strap over it with six or eight inches of light chain attached, to which fasten a good malleable harness snap. Put the snap in the nose ring and the animal can be led without the rope if so desired.

Agricultural Fairs in October.

The following state and provincial fairs have been announced for October:

Alabama—Montgomery, Oct. 17-23.
Canadian Exposition—Toronto, Oct. 5-17.
Colorado—Pueblo, Oct. 4-8.
Georgia—Macon, Oct. 24, Nov. 5.
Missouri—St. Louis, Oct. 3-8.
Missouri—Fat stock, Kansas City, Oct. 27, Nov. 3.
Mississippi—Jackson, Oct. 17-22.
North Carolina—Raleigh, Oct. 19-21.
Piedmont Exposition—Atlanta, Ga., Oct. 10-22.
Texas—Dallas, Oct. 20, Nov. 5.
Virginia—Richmond, Oct. 26-28.

How to Make a Good Roller.

The importance of a good roller on the farm is too well known and appreciated to require comment. It is often a question, however, how to secure one. The following description, therefore, of a home made roller by a correspondent in Indiana Farmer will be welcome to many readers:

FIG. 1—A GOOD ROLLER.

Cut three logs 18 inches in diameter 3 feet 2 or 4 inches long; cutter cannot make a frame. Set two rollers end to end, with a space of about 7 or 8 inches between them; make your tongue so high that the pole comes across the end of the roller 8 inches longer than it is from the middle of one frame to the middle of the other; about 4 inches from each end of said cross piece bore a 3-8 inch hole, and with the same bit bore in the center of each frame, both front and back. Set the tongue in raised level with the cross frames, the holes through the cross piece in the end of tongue will correspond with those in the centers of the two frames. Bolt the tongue down to the front roller; a washer about an inch in thickness between the frames and said cross piece, and bolt them with 5-8 inch bolts.

FIG. 2—A GOOD ROLLER.

Now make a bar (s) the same length of the cross piece on the end of the tongue, bore a 5-8 inch hole in each end, each distance apart as in cross piece (b) and it will correspond with the holes in the other ter (f) to two frames, back; slip an inch washer between said bar and said frames back; bolt with 5-8 inch bolt. Now you have a roller to roll corn, or a dead furrow, or a ridge, only the tongue is "limber" or weak. To remedy this, fashion a piece something like the half of a wagon hound, fasten that part that would be front in hounds, just behind the dead-tree on the tongue (s), Fig. 2. It will take on the tongue above the roller, and then arch or raise about twenty inches or two feet above the bar that connects the two frames back; fasten a support from said bar up to said hound, place a seat on said hound where the weight of the driver will balance the tongue, and you have a roller that will roll the two inches of a ditch or the outside of a ridge. Fasten the third roller by a coupling pin (see figure) between two feet long to the middle of the bar that connects the two front rollers together, and it will roll the space left between the two front ones.

Sowing Wheat.

The manner in which wheat is sown is of vital importance, for its influence is felt to a great extent right on to the harvest. Perhaps the most important matters in the thorough preparation of the seed bed. That it pays to carefully prepare the soil for wheat has been proven time and again, and yet not one field in ten is properly stirred and pulverized before the seed is sown. Remember that it is impossible to the care of wheat to make the soil too mellow or too fine. All work done in this direction is amply paid for by the future crop.

It also pays to drill in the seed, even if one has to hire the drill. It insures the even dropping and covering of the seed, and is a saving of seed. Avoid the use of foul or imperfect seed; it is a waste of time, labor and land to sow wheat that has not been carefully screened and winnowed to free it from foreign and imperfect seed. In sections where smut is likely to appear avail yourself of such preventive measures as treating the seed to brine or a solution of blue vitriol.

Each farmer must decide in great measure the question as to what variety of wheat to sow. It is not a safe plan to make an entire change in any one season, and especially where the previous yields have proven fairly satisfactory. A safe rule is to sow the soil devoted to the main crop in some will tended wheat in your own locality, and experiment with promising new sorts on a small scale. A bushel of good, clear seed, drilled in, is considered an ample quantity for one acre by many farmers. The usual rule is from one bushel to five pecks, drilled in, and about one-half bushel more sown broadcast.

Saving Seed Corn.

The importance of saving seed corn by careful selection has been preached from time to time out of date, and repeated experiment has proven the necessity for care in the storing of the corn selected for seed. In sections where short seasons prevail early varieties are desirable, hence earliness ought to be promoted even in sorts already early by selecting such from stalks that first ripen their ears. The importance of choosing fair-sized, well-developed ears, taken from stalks which bore at least two ears, is apparent to every one who has given the subject any thought.

In the selection of seed corn too much care cannot be exercised in keeping a well-established and desirable variety pure. It should be borne in mind that two sorts growing within a quarter of a mile of one another are liable to mix; hence it is not wise to save seed from such corn.

Where does not appear to be any advantage or better mode of saving corn for seed than the old time one of pilling back husks leaving the husks of twenty or more ears together, and then hanging these braided strands from the rafters of a corn house, a smoke house, the attic or other dry place. The corn must be kept dry and out of the reach of rats and mice. It is a wise plan to select only the perfectly sound ears for seed; these dry more quickly and are not so liable to mold. Not a few farmers always plan to hang their seed corn between the rafters of their smoke houses, believing that, in addition to the dry atmosphere there found, the smoke that permeates the kernels acts as a preventive to insect pests after the seed is planted.

The Hessian Fly.

There are two broods of the Hessian fly brought to perfection each year, one in the fall and one in the spring. The mature female insect deposits its eggs upon the leaves of the young plant soon after these appear above ground. As soon as the eggs hatch the young worms make their way down the leaf to its base, where they remain between it and the stem near the roots. It requires several weeks for the larvæ to attain full size. In skin then is hard and brown, and, to the unaided eye, the insect presents the appearance of a small flaxseed. In this condition it remains until spring, when the fly comes forth and lays its eggs, and so the operation is repeated. The preventive measures that have from time to time been devised by scientists and practical farmers may be briefly told as follows:

Sow a part of the wheat early, and it will be affected by the fly put in the rest of the seed after Sept. 20. The idea is that by destroying the first brood the second will not appear.

Partially affected wheat is sometimes saved by the use of fertilizers and care ful cultivation, and if winter wheat, the fields may be recuperated in the spring.

Many of the eggs and larvæ may be destroyed by pasturing with sheep and close cropping of winter wheat in November or early December. Some claim that rolling the ground will answer nearly as well.

Another remedy is to sow hardy varieties of wheat, especially those that tiller vigorously.

Lime, soot and salt are named as special remedies, and it is also very generally recommended to rake off the stubble. Objections are, however, urged by scientists against close cutting and burning the stubble, as this is liable to result in the destruction of many parasites, the ichneumon fly among the rest. It has been estimated that these parasites (which, by the by, farmers often mistake for the pests) destroy at least nine-tenths of all the Hessian flies hatched.

Keeping Cider Sweet.

There is no process known that will keep cider sweet without deteriorating its quality somewhat, but there are various methods for arresting fermentation and preventing it from becoming sour. Professional cider makers sometimes use Shaw's Antiseptic Solution; others, who prefer to avoid patented articles, employ sulphite of lime, which is added after fermentation has proceeded until the cider has acquired the acid taste desired. The sulphite is first mixed in a quart or so of cider and then poured into the cask and thoroughly shaken. Do not mistake sulphate of lime for sulphite of lime; the latter is the correct article.

To Cabbage Worm.

The cabbage worm has not been visibly affected by the hard things said against him, nor have the numerous sure cure remedies sensibly affected his appetite. Peter Henderson suggests the application of alum water, one pound of pulverized alum to three gallons of water. This will not injure the plant and may kill the worm. Pyrethrum, either in powder or solution, is effective. The great difficulty is to get any preparation on the vegetable to stay until the application as often as the successive broods hatch out.

ITALIAN WOOD GATHERERS.

Cool Hills Unknown to New York's Italian Tenement Dwellers.

Among the earliest risers in the city are the crisp faced women from the Italian tenements of Mott and Mulberry streets. The gray light has barely streaked the eastern sky before, in groups of three or four, by twos and threes, old ages, from the withered and wrinkled crone of four score to the little girl of eight years, they can be seen hurrying along the streets to begin their daily toil. They seem to be always in high spirits, and as they pass along they laugh and chatter and show their glistening teeth, and are as merry as bands of school girls on the eve of a holiday. They are brave hearted, these women, and by constant labor reduce the household expenses of Mulberry street to a minimum. Cold baths with them are unknown. All the wood they use for cooking purposes is carried on their heads, often long distances from places where old buildings are being torn down. A reporter, standing at the foot of Franklin's statue in Printing House square a daybreak on a recent morning, counted sixty-three Italian women in thirty minutes. They came from the direction of the Italian quarter and passed down Nassau street. Each one carried a coarse cloth or towel. Some were barefoot, some had shoes and stockings, and still others wore the common skin-without the stockings. Their black hair, freshly plaited and greased, was tied in coils about their heads and formed jewelry hung about their necks and from their ears.

"Where are they all going so early in the morning?" asked the reporter of a big, broad backed policeman who stood watching the women and swinging his club.

The officer replied that a large six-storied building was being torn down and they were going down to carry off the wooden wreckage.

"Several hundred of them go down here every morning about this time," said he. "In about twenty minutes, if you wait, you will see them coming back with loads on their heads sufficient to break the back of a brewery wagon horse."

The reporter waited. The swarthy women still came in a stream from Center street, crossed the square and hurried down Nassau street out of sight. Presently the first of the industrious housekeepers was seen returning staggering under a load carried on her head of heavy pieces of beams, broken laths and fragments of dusty woodwork. Her bundle was tied about with a stout cord. Her towel, folded into a pad, protected the skull from the rough surface of the load. The woman's face was a study for a painter in its expression of pride and unalloyed happiness. Capt. Kidd, bearing away the spoils of a rich Spanish galleon, couldn't have been more thoroughly at peace with himself and all the world than the heavily laden child of the Apennines, as with one arm akimbo on her stout hips and the other free to steady her burden, she steered straight for the Bend of Mulberry street. As she passed out of view other women with similar loads on their heads drove in sight in Nassau street. Soon that narrow thoroughfare was a moving mass of great bundles of wood drifting steadily toward the Bend.

They make excellent scavengers," said the policeman. "The contractor are glad to get rid of the wood and give them every chance to clean up a torn down building." The price of coal also affects them Mulberry street Italians, so long as the women can bring in wood by the ton."—New York Tribune.

The Beginning of Cotton.

Herodotus mentions cotton fabrics 450 B. C., and speaks of trees in India "bearing as their fruit fleeces more beautiful and beautiful than those of sheep." The cotton fabrics of the Hindoos have been excelled in firmness and texture only by the productions of the most perfect machines of modern times. The city of Dacca, on the western coast, gave its name to the fabric known as muslin. Forrester describes some of their goods as "so fine that you could hardly feel them in your hand, and the finest, when spun, is hardly discernible."—American Agriculturist.

Mexican Steamship Line.

It is announced that by Sept. 1 the International company, of Mexico, will have established a line of new steamships between San Diego and twenty Mexican and Central American ports, which line will ultimately be extended to South America. Negotiations are now in progress for the land grant of the New Zealand and Australian steamships at San Diego, for transportation across the continent by the Santa Fe trail. It is also said that cipper ships are to ply between New York and San Diego.—Public Opinion.

Surgeon's Valuable Aid.

Another valuable aid to the surgeon is the newly discovered addition to the laryngoscope. They place the heretofore usually insulated glass electric light tips or burners on the wire electrodes that are permanently and are enabled to light up the cavities of the throat and larynx so as clearly to see the most minute diseased organs, and adopt the requisite treatment thus pathology indicates.—Demorest's Monthly.

Mrs. Cleveland's Wrists.

It has been remarked that Mrs. Cleveland possesses exceptionally strong wrists, and is consequently able to endure the prolonged handshaking of public receptions without overfatigue. The strength of muscle is attributed to her persistent use of dumb bells. She is said to be fond of a gymnast, and owes much of her graceful carriage to the thorough command of her body given by calisthenic exercises.—New York Sun.

Remedy and Disease.

Thoreau was a botanist. He had a thought that wherever a disease or accident occurs the remedy is near at hand. He mentions, in confirmation of this, that once walking in a Massachusetts wood, he slipped and bruised his ankle, and at the same moment he saw the remedy, arnica, growing on the spot.—Frank Leslie's.

Steel framed cabs are now being manufactured in England, with a view to lightness and greater durability than if wood were used for the purpose.

Personal.

Mr. H. N. Fridlachtin, of Mobile, Ala., writes: I take great pleasure in recommending Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, having used it for a severe attack of Bronchitis and Catarrh. It gave me instant relief and entirely cured me, and I have not been afflicted since. I also beg to state that I have tried other remedies with no good result. Have also used Electric Bitters and Dr. King's New Life Pills, both of which I can recommend.

JOHNSTON'S SARSAPARILLA
LIVER COMPLAINT, DYSPEPSIA,
AND FOR PURIFYING THE BLOOD.

It has been in use for more than a quarter of a century, giving satisfaction to the sick, and is now recommended by many physicians as a tonic. THE SIDE OR BACK, LIVER COMPLAINT, FIMPLES, THE PALLID DYSPEPSIA, PILES, and all diseases that arise from a disordered LIVER, are speedily cured by this medicine. Those who take it and give it to their children, Physicians and Nurses, testify to it. Those who use it once recommend it to others.

It is strictly vegetable, and can not injure the most delicate constitution. It is one of the best medicines in use for Regulating the Bowels.

It is sold by responsible druggists at one dollar for a quart bottle, or three bottles for $5.00.

Those who can not obtain a bottle of it from their druggist may send the money, and we will deliver it to them free of any charge.

W. JOHNSTON & CO., Manufacturers,
DETROIT, MICH.

A GENTLEMAN having been cured of Nervous Prostration, Seminal Weakness, Premature Decay, and all the evil effects of early indiscretion and youthful folly, is anxious to make known to others the simple mode of self-cure. To those who wish and will give him their symptoms, he will send (free) by return mail a copy of the recipe so successfully used in his case.

Address, in confidence, JAMES W. PINKNEY, 42 Cedar St., N. Y.

SEEING A PRESIDENT.

Thousands of Children Swinging Flags to Capture the Heart of Mrs. Cleveland.

The President's train arrived at Columbus, Ohio, at 4:25 a. m., on Saturday, and remained only long enough to change engines. About one thousand persons were at the depot, but as the party were asleep no whole station was made. At Richmond, Ind., after daylight, the President was out on the platform and shook hands with all who could get to him during the five minutes' stop. At Indianapolis the drizzling rain ceased, and the sun shone out as the procession moved from the depot to the State House through streets thronged with people and gaily decorated. At the State House stand had been erected, to which the President was conducted, and a speech of welcome was made by Governor Gray. The President responded, complimenting the State of Indiana and its capital, and paying a handsome tribute to the memory of Vice President Hendricks. At Terre Haute, Ind., the President remarked that he has some acquaintance with the most widely known product of that region, the "Fall Sycamore of the Wabash," and he made up his mind that the Sycamore "has height enough and size enough for any locality or for any purpose."

EFFORTS TO BEHEAD A JUDGE.

A Sensational Allegation Resulting from Sarah Althea Hill's Suit.

At San Francisco, ex-Judge David S. Terry, one of the counsel for Sarah Althea Sharon in the well-known suit against the executor of the late Senator Sharon, has filed an affidavit in the Supreme Court in which he charges that one of the defendants counsel, who was an ex-Judge, during the trial of the case in the Superior Court offered Judge Sullivan, before whom the case was tried, a check duly signed with the amount left out to be filled in by the Judge if he could be tempted to accept a bribe; with such sum as he chose, as a consideration for deciding the case in favor of the defendant. The only one of Sharon's counsel who is an ex-Judge is Oliver P. Evans. It is understood that Judge Evans called on Judge Sullivan after the above affidavit had been made public, and demanded to know if he was the authority for the statement, but Judge Sullivan declined to give a definite answer. This is the culmination of a series of sensational episodes growing out of the Sharon case, and the advent of Judge Terry has created a great sensation.

MORTUARY.

A Champion of Labor Falls.

THE HON. THOMAS A. ARMSTRONG, editor and proprietor of the National Labor Tribune, the leading labor journal of the country, died at Pittsburg from the effects of a wound received in an engagement during the late war. Deceased was one of the most prominent labor leaders in the United States, and was frequently commended for his conservatism. He was a member of numerous societies, and was one of the founders of the Veteran Legion. At the time of his death he was in the 48th year of his age.

Flames in a Lodging-House.

FIRE was discovered in the "English Kitchen," a cheap lodging-house at Detroit. The fire broke out in the rear of the building, and in an instant of escape for the imprisoned lodgers, not only by way of the staircases, but by the fire-escape as well. The inmates in their efforts to avoid the flames climbed out on the window-sills, whence came piercing screams of "Fire!" "Murder!" "We're burning alive!" The fire department soon had ladders ran up to the windows, and all escaped three men were secured. One of the three was burned beyond recognition, the second died from suffocation before he was removed from the building, and the third, Charles Peterson, aged 23, single, though rescued alive, is so badly injured that his recovery is very doubtful. The dead are: Elisha Stub, of Breckenridge, Mo.; an unknown man, aged about 25 years.

Deaths from Cholera.

At the office of the Quarantine Commission in New York, on Saturday three deaths were reported from cholera at Swinburne Island. Five new cases have been taken to the island during the last report. There are now seventeen cases on the island, and most of them are getting on favorably, despite the weather.

Minor Telegrams.

PARIS rumors say that the sister of Mrs. ROBERT MACKAY, who some time ago married Count Tolpener, has finally separated from that ornament of society.

A MONTREAL dispatch reports that Samuel Johnson, the defaulting treasurer of a powder company in that city, was persuaded to return from Ogdensburg, N. Y., and when near Montreal jumped from the train and shot himself.

Manitoba's wheat crop is said to be in excess of the most liberal estimates.

GREAT excitement exists at Bellevue, Ohio, on account of the failure of the Bellevue Bank at that place. The failure was caused by poor investments and bad managements. The liabilities are about $100,000. The depositors are made secure and will lose nothing. The failure will result also in the suspension of the Bellevue Milling Company.

THE EASTERN STATES.

NOT since that day in Ax past thirty-six years ago, when the great old yacht bearing the proud name of America sailed around the Isle of Wight, distancing the fleet of the Royal Yacht Squadron, and won the cup which now, as the emblem of the yacht's superiority, bears the name of the schooner that won it, has such a victory been won by any American over any foreign competitor as the peerless Yankee sloop-yacht Volunteer won over the peerless Scotch cutter-yacht Thistle on Tuesday last, says a New York telegram. This race was the first of a series to be sailed for the America's cup by these two yachts, the best two in three to win. The result was a most decisive victory for the America, sloop. Beating, stretching, and running with free sheets the Volunteer outsailed the Thistle. The total distance was thirty-eight statute miles. Everywhere, except on the run with spinnakers, where the excursion steamer did so much to keep the wind from her, the Volunteer outsailed her antagonist. The following are the figures:

	Start.	Buoy 10.	Light-ship.
Volunteer	10 30 0	11 6 0	12 30 0
Thistle	10 31 0	11 8 0	1 1 15
		Elapsed Correct time.	Corrected time.
Volunteer	2 30 15	4 33 39	4 33 39
Thistle	2 46 15	5 11 47	5 12 32

The Volunteer beat the Thistle 19 minutes 39 seconds. After the race Mr. James Bell, principal owner of the Thistle, said he was not at all satisfied with the result. The Thistle, he declared, has never moved so slowly through the water. He was of the opinion that there was "something wrong with the cutter's bottom." Appended is a description of the two yachts:

	VOLUNTEER.	THISTLE.
Length over all	136.22 feet	136.22 feet
Length of water line	86.00 feet	86.00 feet
Breadth of beam	25.50 feet	25.50 feet
Depth of hold	16.00 feet	16.00 feet
Length of sail area	128.00 feet	128.00 feet
Length for time allowance	89.55 feet	89.55 feet
	VOLUNTEER.	THISTLE.
Length over all	108.5 feet	108.5 feet
Length of water line	86.46 feet	86.46 feet
Breadth of beam	25.5 feet	25.5 feet
Depth of hold	14.10 feet	14.10 feet
Draft	13.5 feet	13.5 feet
Length for time allowance	89.26 feet	89.26 feet

THE most astonishing failures of the season are those of extensive breweries. Most people supposed that the prestige of these concerns is so large as to render bankruptcy almost impossible. But one of the largest breweries in Philadelphia, the Lafayette, has gone under with a load of $250,000 of liabilities; assets reported at about $100,000. The failure is charged to a combination of other brewers against the Enterprise.

THE Farmers' Bank at Newcastle, Del., was entered at an early hour by masked robbers. Their movements awoke the cashier, who seized his pistol and fired, wounding one of the intruders. His companions picked up the wounded man and quickly carried him out the front door, making their escape. The bank door is marked with blood where he fell. The robbers got no booty, and left behind them a kit of burglar's tools, a wheel-barrow and a ladder. They are supposed to have come and gone by way of a boat in the river near by. The burglars immediately on entering the building overpowered, bound and gagged William J. Black, United States Consul at Nuremberg, who was home on leave of absence and stopping with Cashier Richard G. Cooper. When Mr. Cooper came on the scene he was confronted by one of the burglars with leveled revolver and the mandate: "Don't say a word." "I won't," replied Cooper, instantly leaving and firing his own pistol and wounding the robber, who returned the shot without harming Cooper.

NEW YORK telegram: "Of the seven Alexander's cancer patients Marie Ross (Cain), aged 41 years, and Teresa Lowell, aged 66 years, were to-day removed from Hoffman Island to the Quarantine Hospital. The former was taken sick the morning and is very ill. Louisa Leavitt is not seriously ill at present. The patients removed to the hospital yesterday have improved. The reaction is said to give hope of recovery. Dominico Morrillo is fully convalescent, and Peter Carbaroni will probably be able to leave the sick ward to-morrow. All other persons on Hoffman Island and on board the Alesia are well."

THE America's cup remains in America. The Volunteer won a great victory on Friday, and settled for the present her superiority over any yacht ever designed on the other side of the Atlantic. She crossed the finish line in the great international contest more than ten minutes ahead of the Thistle. When the Yankee's victory was assured cannon were boomed and innumerable steam whistles emitted vigorous screeches. Hundreds of craft of all sorts had gathered to honor Commodore Paine's famous yacht, and all celebrated the victory in boisterous fashion. As the victorious American crossed the line the American flag was sent to the masthead of everything afloat, and the thousands on the excursion boats burst forth into one long-continued shout of triumph. The correct time at the finish was: Volunteer, 4:32:10; Thistle, 4:34.

THE WESTERN STATES.

A CHICAGO dispatch of Thursday says: The arrival of Captain Black and his wife at the County Jail yesterday, bringing, as they did, the latest news from General Pryor as to his expectations regarding their chances before the United States Supreme Court, served to stimulate the Anarchists into a mental activity quite unusual of late. Mr. and Mrs. Black squeezed the fingers of all the condemned men, and the Captain held a lengthy private conversation with Spies and Fielden. They listened attentively to all that was said, and appeared to be considerably cheered. The attorney remarked that he and Mr. Salomon had returned, after a lengthy interview with Mr. Pryor, to secure a complete transcript of the record. This, he said, would occupy some time, as the record is very lengthy, but he expected it would be completed in time to go with the application for a writ of error and supersedeas to the United States Supreme Court. "General Pryor," Captain Black said, "examined the record which I took to New York with me. It was complete, but not clerical. He weighed every point raised in the record carefully and reached the conclusion that there was not the slightest doubt but a writ of error will issue when the application is properly made."

THE Commercial Tribune of Friday contains its annual statement, from special correspondents, in regard to the corn crop of 1887, in which it is shown that the aggregate crop is estimated at 1,551,000,000 bushels, against last year's crop of 1,635,000,000, indicating a shortage of 125,000,000 bushels compared with 1886. In the seven Western surplus States the shortage is 161,000,000 bushels, and adding six other corn-growing States the shortage is 208,000,000 bushels for the thirteen States. Compared with an annual average for five years—1882 to 1885, inclusive—the crop shortage is 108,000,000 bushels, the thirteen States being deficient 196,000,000 bushels in the comparison.

IN the United States Court at St. Louis, on Thursday, Judge Thomas M. Cooley, late judge of the Supreme Court of Michigan, who was called upon to act as Judge in Oliver P. Evans. It is understood that Judge Evans called on Judge Sullivan after the above affidavit had been made public, and demanded to know if he was the authority for the statement, but Judge Sullivan declined to give a definite answer. This is the culmination of a series of sensational episodes growing out of the Sharon case, and the advent of Judge Terry has created a great sensation.

Dresses for the Autumn.

Tailored black dresses for the intermediate season are, says Harper's Bazar, made of cashmere or camel's hair flannel on a round nutrimmed skirt of black silk in blocks, stripes, or checker board squares an inch or more in size. The skirt has not even a foot pleating, but is hung on a gored foundation skirt; the front and sides may be quite plain, or in broad vertical sash side pleats; the back is full straight breadths shirred at the top. The wool drapery forms two long points behind, simply hemmed, reaching to the foot, and opening in the middle to show the silk underskirt; the sides are plain. The basque opens over a chemisette of the silk, and has a round raised collar or revers for its trimming.

This arrangement can be completely varied, and is at present by buying two of the remnants left over from the spring, and the plan will cost less money than if passementeries are used for trimming. The lustrous silk will brighten up the black wool goods almost as well as the jet trimmings that were of dark complexion think necessary on their black dresses.

For more dressy toilets this design can be carried out in black Bengaline draped over a striped silk in which are old rose and rose green stripes on black, or else over black watered silk, alternating with copper-red repiqué stripes, or the dark Madras plaids of cream, red, and moss-green lines barred across a black ground. English women delight in these black toilets, varied by gray colors, and look complete then by a small, low, round-brimmed turban made up of the plain black material in drawn tucks, full over the frame, ornamented with two or three red or blue quills thrust through a bunch of ribbon loops directly in front. Parisiennes will wear the broad-brimmed Marlborough hat of felt with a soft low crown; the brim is turned up on the left and drawn down low on one side and turned up against the crown on the other, and held there by a bunch of ribbon loops and some cocks' plumes.

The draped and folled waistcoats so much in favor at present will remain a feature of autumn and winter gowns. All bodices will be elaborately trimmed in front, with the exception of those made by tailors, and these will have narrow fur garniture, in the shape of smooth vests and slender revers that widen at the top and extend around the neck below the standing collar. Repiqué silk, Bengaline, velvet, and fur will be used for vests, and will partly cover both revers, the cloth of the dress goods extending beyond the silk, and being stitched in rows or perhaps ornamented with narrow braid.

Long straight polonaises will be made of the heavy silk repiqué for winter costumes for the street; these are not to be caught up on the hips, but are cut very full in that plaits behind, and sloping away toward the front, so as to show the shirred revers of the skirt beneath, which will be entirely or partially concealed by the exercise of taste and ingenuity in the combination of materials. The surplice piece could be all silk, velvet, lace or even of wide ribbon, if the waist is a silk or a woolen fabric; and a contrast in color can be employed. For cotton goods they might be of white or colored embroidery, either all over or with an edge.

Gowns for Autumn.

Smooth cloths will be used again for dressy suits, but they will have a marked contrast appearing in one element. For three combination cloth costumes the lighter color will be used for the lower skirt and vest, with a dark basque and drapery; the trimming is braiding on the vest and lower part of the skirt; the color used for the upper part; thus serpent green cloth will be draped over a skirt of gray cloth which is elaborately braided with green like that of the overdress; another gown has a skirt of tobacco brown cloth with a polonaise of dark blue cloth, and the braiding on the light brown vest and the skirt border is of dark blue like that of the polonaise. When a jacket is added it matches the color of the upper part of the gown; small mantles and still smaller shoulder capes are made of combinations of the two colors softened by the use of braid in complicated designs and of fringe made of the braid. Plaked edges are again seen on imported cloth gowns, forming side-bands, yokes, borders, and vests, made of alternating rows of dark and light cloths, as pansy color with fawn or Havana brown with cactus red.

Plain and plaid cloths will be seen together in autumn gowns, with the basque of the plain smooth cloth and the skirt with its long drapery of large plaided cloth or ribbed cloth. For those who prefer that the greater part of the plaid should be of plain cloth the plaid is confined to the lower skirt and is only visible at the foot and up each side and in the middle of the back between the plain drapery, which may be in points or in square-cornered long ends.

For gowns of one color for traveling dresses the fall straight breadths are shirred at the top. The wool drapery forms two long points behind, simply hemmed, reaching to the foot, and opening in the middle to show the silk underskirt; the sides are plain. The basque opens over a chemisette of the silk, and has a round raised collar or revers for its trimming.

Novelties for Fair Equestrienses.

With the widespread revival of horseback riding has come a number of pretty brooches in suggestive patterns, such as a horseshoe, a whip, a saddle, etc. English crops divide honor with whips among the fair equestrienses. Both whips and crops are out with decorative tassels. No one supposes they are used for anything but an adornment to attract universal admiration. Some have fall heads with tassels and other ornamentation and oxidized finish; others are a remarkably pleasing combination of gold and silver. The tassels of the handles the silver work is wrought with artistic taste, and the tassels are smooth surface is etched in odd designs.

Crepe Stuffs.

Crepe stuffs are coming into vogue, the silk, velvet, lace or even of wide ribbon, if the waist is a silk or a woolen fabric; and a contrast in color can be employed. For cotton goods they might be of white or colored embroidery, either all over or with an edge.

English women delight in these black toilets, varied by gray colors, and look complete then by a small, low, round-brimmed turban made up of the plain black material in drawn tucks, full over the frame, ornamented with two or three red or blue quills thrust through a bunch of ribbon loops directly in front. Wedding Bells.

From the Albion Recorder.

The most brilliant social event of the year occurred at the charming home of Mr. and Mrs. Horatio Gale, Michigan ave., Wednesday evening, the occasion being the marriage of their daughter, Miss Nellie B. Gale and Mr. Harvey Lee Iddings, of Charlevoix.

The marriage ceremony was performed at 6 o'clock, by the Rev. J. T. Iddings, of Reading, father of the groom, Rev. D. F. Barnes, of Kalamazoo, assisting. Only the relatives and immediate neighbors and a few friends who had kindly assisted in the arrangements being present.

The reception was from eight till half past ten o'clock in the evening, and for this portion of the ceremony hundreds of beautifully engraved invitations were sent out. At the hour designated the guests began to assemble, and throughout the evening the brilliantly lighted and handsomely decorated apartments were filled with the friends who came to congratulate the young people and to wish them a life of unalloyed happiness and prosperity. The bay window in the south end of the front parlor had been set apart for the bride and groom and it seemed a fairy bower of unsurpassed loveliness, so charmingly had those entrusted with the work of decoration succeeded in twining together the leaves and flowers and the various adornments of which it was formed. Here they remained, and with their parents and immediate relatives ranged on either side received the kindly words of the guests of the evening as they were presented by the young gentlemen selected to perform that duty.

The bride wore a beautiful dress of white satin, and many of the ladies from at home and abroad were richly attired in silks and satins of various hues and colors, so that in the glare of the brilliantly lighted and elaborately decorated rooms during the continuance of the reception was one of surpassing beauty, and gave to the occasion a charm that will linger pleasantly in the memory of those who were present.

Refreshments were served in the adjoining residence of Mrs. Gale's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Blanchard. A temporary walk had been constructed from door to door of the two houses, which was neatly carpeted, and as the evening was pleasant no inconvenience was occasioned by the arrangement. We need hardly elaborate as to the refreshments; they were bountiful, excellent, and embraced several courses, and were served by colored waiters from Kalamazoo. A neatly tied-up package of the bridal cake was presented each guest.

Mr. and Mrs. Gale in the capacity of host and hostess, gave careful attention to the pleasure of their guests desiring that their welcome should be cordial and unreserved rather than formal and ostentatious, and evincing throughout a noticable purpose to indicate in all they did a tender solicitude for the daughter whose happiness was to them greater than all other considerations.

The opening chapter in the wedded life of these young people was amid surroundings so delightful and protestations of friendship so sincere that one could not wish them more than that their future happiness could be measured by the unmistakable pleasure of the present. After a brief sojourn in Chicago they go to Charlevoix, where Mr. Iddings is a popular and prosperous merchant, and where he has recently completed an elegant residence for the reception of his bride.

The presents, which were in part shown in one of the upper rooms, embraced an unusually large and elegant variety of useful articles, including several from friends who were unable to be present. The gift from Mr. and Mrs. Gale was a complete outfit of furniture and an elegant piano for the new house, which were sent direct from Detroit. A solid silver water set, solid silver tea set, forks spoons, several beautiful oil paintings, an elegant clock, etc., made up a collection which will be a source of happiness to the recipients for many years.

It was near eleven o'clock when the last good night, good bye and God speed had been said, and the young people were left to pass an hour, prior to their departure on the evening express for Chicago, with the parents and relatives who remained in the house, and so passed an evening which will be memorable in the history of Albion, both for the pleasure so many derived from the occasion, and for the interest which will be taken in the welfare of these highly esteemed young people.

IRONTON, Oct. 11.—Sunday was a wet day.

The school at Advance opened up on Monday, Oct. 3d., Mrs. Pope as principal.

Fall wheat is coming up nicely.

A gentleman from Charlevoix, spoke on the question of Band of Hope last Friday evening at the M. E. church. A collection to the amount of $1.80 was taken up for the benefit of the Band of Hope.

Edward Jackson and family, left for Mancelona on Monday, where they will live this winter.

A letter from A. D. Joles, of Ozark, states that Geo. Clendening is there in partnership with him cutting wood.

We are pleased to note that Mrs. Maud Benson, who has been very sick for a long time, has so far recovered as to be able to do her own work.

Chas. Peterson and son, of Petoskey, arrived last week and are making ready for winter's work, getting out wood. They have the lumber on the ground for shanties.

Ironton has an industrial school, which has been in progress some time, under the supervision of Miss Eva Adams. The school is held every Saturday afternoon in the Congregational church. On Saturday we were informed that, although the attendance was not as large as usual, there were 27 present. At this writing we cannot say how large a membership they have, but they are doing remarkably well. In addition to the above, we will remark that on Thursday evening last, this school gave an entertainment consisting of bible representations and recitation. The exercises were opened by a march, by thirty little girls ranging from thirteen down to three years of age, two by two, singing as they marched. The ten virgins, was well rendered. A song by little Miss Lizzie Garland was very nicely sung and reflected great credit on the little girl. The entertainment reflects great credit on both teacher and children, and everyone was well satisfied. The admission fee was 10cts, and netted $14.57. There is some talk of another entertainment in the near future.

It's a pity that the quiet little village of Ironton should be disgraced by vulgar talk as was heard to come from the pretty mouths of two of Ironton's females on last Thursday night, as was heard by your reporter and others while returning home from the industrial school entertainment. How a woman can disgrace herself by such talk is more than we can explain.

O. D. Wood, of Charlevoix, was in town for a short time last Wednesday on business.

The steam barge Westover, of Milwaukee, cleared on Saturday night with a load of pig iron, for Chicago.

☞It is surprising how Chas. A. Bedwin is filling up his store with dry goods. He received another large invoice of goods last week; in fact he receives dry goods and groceries almost every day. Give Charlie a call, look over his stock and be convinced that you can do no better in the county in bargains for cash. Potatoes taken the same as cash.

The Result of Cleveland's Trip.

While his reception have not assumed the character of a partisan demonstration, it has shown the hold which Grover Cleveland as a man has taken on the hearts of the people since the eyes of the people have been turned on him as president.

Reading reports of the conduct of the throngs that have assembled to greet him it is not possible to doubt that there is an affectionate regard and fellow-feeling for the man, prompting the demonstration in honor of the president.

His visit to the west has brought him close to the people, and it has demonstrated once more that the people can be trusted to recognize and honor the elements of sturdy, sterling manhood wherever they find them.—Peoria Review.

RUINED RECORDS.

The Court House Burned Last Saturday Night.

The Books and Papers of the Register's Office Totally Destroyed.

Early Sunday morning the people of Charlevoix were startled by the announcement that at 10 o'clock Saturday night the court house at Boyne City had burned, and that all the records of the office of register of deeds were destroyed. As the board of supervisors were to meet on the next Monday, all sorts of speculations were indulged in, as to the cause and extent of the disaster. In the afternoon of Sunday the steamer North Star made a trip to Boyne City, and a representative of the JOURNAL visited the scene of the fire.

At supper time Saturday afternoon Ben Weaver deputy register, S. B. Thatcher county clerk, and Willis Hurd, under sheriff, closed the office, Mr. Weaver putting all his books into the safe, and closing and locking the doors. At ten o'clock an alarm of fire was given by some one, and before help could arrive the flames were beyond control. The safe and books were removed from the treasurer's room and part of the furniture saved. Most of the clerk's files and furniture were also saved.

Before reaching the fire, Mr. Weaver felt satisfied that his own records were safe, but was astonished to discover that the doors had been opened and part of the books laid out on the desk. Fire and smoke prevented any one from going into the room, and no effort was made to shut the doors with long poles, but the wrong door was closed first, which rendered further work fruitless. Thus in a few minutes, the official records of all the real estate transactions of the county since its organization were blotted out.

And for what?

Circumstances point strong toward incendiarism. The fire was first discovered in the telephone room adjoining register's office, more than twenty feet from any stove, pipe, or chimney. The big safe had been opened, although Mr. Weaver is positive he put in all the books and closed and locked his safe before going to supper, and he is supported by both Mr Thatcher and Mr. Hurd. A man was seen to enter the building with a lantern about nine o'clock; and there are a number of other incidents too numerous to mention in these columns until after being given to the proper committee of investigation, which prove to the minds of many people that the burning was incendiary.

The loss of these records is a calamity that will be more fully appreciated each year, as the people find themselves plunged into a chaotic state of litigation.

This affair seems to be but one link in a series of very singular coincidences, and helps to make some very unpleasant history to be recorded against this county.

Michigan Mention.

Some of the ladies of Cheboygan have inaugurated a regular weekly pie sale to raise money for their so cieties. Pies are sold whole or by the piece.

Manistee, Mich., Oct. 5.—The schooner Jessie Scarth lies at the bottom some miles north of here. The crew escaped in a boat. The vessel was loaded with corn from Chicago to Toronto.

Glen Haven, Mich., Oct. 6.—The Pulaski was struck by a gale and her crew, with the help of the life saving crew tried to run her into Good Harbor bay. She went ashore, however and was grounding badly when the crew left her.

The well being sunk in a search for salt by the St. Ignace Manufacturing Co., reached gas on Saturday, Sept. 28th, at a depth of 913 feet. The flow was sufficent to force water out of the well. It is expected that a short distance further down a larger vein will be struck.—Record.

Migration to Siberia.

An immense migration movement is proceeding in Central Russia. Peasants and farmers are going in large numbers to Western Siberia, where free pasture and arable lands abound. The movement threatens to result in a serious agricultural crisis.—Frank Leslie's.

It will be a novel sight to see an American born boy sitting as a peer in the English house of lords. But the direct living descendant in the oldest son line of the English house of Fairfax is the son of a Virginia farmer. The other day he was driving a mule team in a Loudoun county bayfield.—Chicago Times.

The Quakers' Happier Life.

The Friends, vulgarly called Quakers, are a peculiar people. Their theories of non-resistance, spirit impulses and mutual help are founded on a literal interpretation of Bible language. If it is to these theories they owe their average longevity and enjoyment of life others might find it advantageous to adopt them. But it is more logical to infer that longevity to the rules of life the Friends' society inculcates. A "Friend" is required to adjure ambition; to be industrious and unselfish; to live within his income, whatever it be; to avoid all flaring ostentation in dress or equipage; to seek solid comfort and avoid indulgence in pleasures that excite the passions. In no sense communists, they support comfortably their poor, and aid those unfortunate in late life until it becomes plain that the aid is bestowed on the unworthy or pitiful. By a recent report of the society it appears that of the 229 "Friends" who died last year in Great Britain and Ireland only 22 were under 5 years of age; between 5 and 10 years there were 3 deaths; between 10 and 20 years, 9; from 20 to 30 years the deaths numbered 18; from 30 to 40 years, 16; from 40 to 50 years, 22; from 50 to 60 years, 23; from 60 to 70 years, 51; from 70 to 80 years, 74; from 80 to 90 years, 69, and from 90 to 100 years, 10.

The average age attained among them is thus about 55 years, while the average age now reached by the people of Great Britain and America is certainly not above 37.5, and these nations in this respect surpass all others. The viability of a child born in the family of a Friend is therefore 17.5 years greater than that of the children at large. The low rate of infant mortality is especially noticeable here. But 9 per cent of the whole number die under 5 years. In this city about 54 per cent. will be found the average for a term of years. Chicago is said by its health officer to have an exceptionally low death rate as compared to other large cities. Six children, then, of the people here die where but one of the Friends' children does. In other words, five-sixths of our infant mortality is prevented by our adoption in child rearing of the regimen of the Friends.—Chicago Herald.

The Open Sesame.

I was a spectator of an incident which illustrated the association of ideas, and perhaps some other things. I came upon a group whose attitude expressed a pained and puzzled interest. The center figures were two very young children holding each other by the hand, one sobbing, the other keeping back the tears. About them was a shabby intentioned woman plying the little things with questions and receiving answers altogether unsatisfactory when not unintelligible. The children had wandered from home, and either from confusion or terror or because they could not speak plainly it was impossible to learn from them where they lived. The mothers in the group tried baby talk with no success, and I was about to venture an experiment of my own when up stepped a school-girl of 10 years with "Lemme try." Bending over the bigger of the little ones, she asked: "Where do you buy your candy?" Intelligence and speech awoke together in the scared little brain that had been proof to cajolery and coaxing, and quick the answer came: "At Smithson." The link connecting the runaways with home had been found, and the discoverer moved off leading them in triumph.—Boston Post.

Funerals in Mexico.

Women do not attend funerals in Mexico; it is against the rules of society, and the reason is said to be that they cry too much. A wife cannot go to her husband's funeral, nor can a mother follow her babe to the grave. One of the prettiest customs in Mexico is the universal respect which greets a passing funeral. Every man, from the millionaire to the half clad poor, takes off his hat till the sad train has passed. Well dressed senoras bow their heads and cross themselves, while Indian women kneel in prayer.—Boston Post.

Chinese Soldiers' Uniform.

The uniform of the Chinese soldier would hardly be considered military in any civilized country. It is a loose costume, much like the Chinese wear in this country, except that the symbol that represents the body of troops to which the individual soldier belongs is placed on the front of the tunic and on the back so that the badge of the brigade to which they belong can be seen whether they advance or retreat. Officers wear the same badge and the same kind of costume except that it is made of silk and is very gorgeous.—Indianapolis Journal.

A Curious Fact.

At Rome and some other places in Italy, the curious observation has been made that a thermometer in the shade sometimes indicates a higher temperature than a thermometer in the sun, particularly when a strong wind strikes the latter instrument.—Arkansaw Traveler.

F. S. Blanchard favors us with a fac simile copy of the New York Herald of October 15, 1865, containing the announcement of the assassination of President Lincoln. He obtained it while at Chicago last week.

When a stranger desires to locate or invest his money in a town the first thing he does is to procure a copy of the local paper. It behooves business men to be constantly represented in the columns of their home paper.

If you wish to see your town prosper patronize the home paper liberally. It shows that your town is enterprising, and many a man judges of a town by the paper it supports. You can't afford to neglect the printer.

The country press is the best advertising medium that the country merchant can obtain. It goes right to the homes he wants to reach. A stock of goods that is not worth advertising in the home paper is no credit to the town.

Real estate boomers, business men's associations, and any organization interested in promoting the prosperity of a town, should bear in mind that a liberal support of their local paper is better than an expensive "write-up" in any metropolitan journal.

D. C. Loveday has resigned the management of the telephone business at East Jordan, and the lines were transferred this week to Dr. Warne's new drug store. The phone in A. F. Draper's old store will be transferred to the new building at the same place.

The Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic Railway line has been completed to Sault Ste. Marie, 47 miles from Soo Junction. A regular passenger service to and from that point will shortly be established. Advices giving train service, rates, etc. will be mailed to applicants in a few days.

Mr. R. A. Campbell has leased the Ossawinamakee House, the leading hotel of Manistique, and will assume charge of same sometime before Dec. 1st. Mr. and Mrs. Campbell will spend a month in visiting relatives in Traverse City and elsewhere on this side before crossing over.—Record.

A friend in St. Louis, Mo., sends us a copy of the Missouri Republican containing a report of the reception given President and Mrs. Cleveland at St. Louis, an illuminated page showing the grand procession of the festival of the veiled prophets, and a supplement to the Evening Chronicle containing portr aits of President and Mrs. Cleveland.

Rev. J. J. Kanagy expects to leave town Thursday morning for a two week's visit with his family in Charlevoix.—Rev. C. F. Van Auken returned from Charlevoix Thursday. Sunday evening closed the meetings at the Tabernacle, and is now assisting Rev. Mr. Tuck at Wolverine in a similar effort.—Vanderbilt Cor. Gaylord Herald.

The new law now in force requires the register of deeds to refuse to receive for record any mortgage which does not contain in the body of the instrument the full address of the mortgagee or mortgagees, including state, county and township. Our lawyers and notaries public should not forget this fact in making out mortgages hereafter.—Record.

The burning of the court house and register's records should be thoroughly investigated, either by the board of supervisors, or by a vigilance committee, and the offenders punished to the full extent of the law. It is a matter of too serious consequence to the freeholders of this county to be passed over lightly, as an ordinary fire.

The country merchant ought to understand that when he is offered job work at low figures by the city offices that he gets poorer stock and work. "You cheated me on the stock," said a Mt. Clemens merchant to the drummer of a city house from which he had got some work at rates way below what the home offices charged for good, honest work. "I had to," was the reply, "to do the work at that price." Comment is superfluous.

☞Those subscribers of the JOURNAL who are six months or more in arrears must get us some cash pretty soon or we shall be compelled to reduce our list. In these days of close collections it is next to impossible to meet our paper bills every month, and trust for an indefinite time, those to whom we send the paper. Look at the address label on your paper and if you are in arrears, come and see us at once.

The time of the G. R. & I. changed on Sunday. Under the new arrangement trains on the main line leave Petoskey going south at 8:20 a. m. and 11 p. m.; arrive from the south at 2:05 a. m. and 8:18 p. m. On Harbor Springs branch, leave Petoskey at 8:40 and 11:30 a. m., and 5:00 and 8:30 p. m.; returning, leave Harbor Springs at 8:00 and 10:20 a. m., and 2:20 and 7:20 p. m. No connection is made with the 11 p. m. and 2:05 a. m. trains on main line.—Record.

Lawyers stand up in a court house before juries, in the presence of large audience, and denounce men as liars, scoundrels, thieves and perjured villains and when the court adjourns the men thus abused appear to harbor no ill will against them. But let a newspaper faintly intimate that a man's character is not without a blemish, and the editor has to confront a horse pistol, stand a libel suit or at least suffer the greatest of all mortifications—an apology.

The Chicago Inter Ocean puts it this way: There are merchants who do not advertise, but they cheerfully pay 20 per cent more for a store room near by a large advertiser in the daily press. Every man who has a store to rent knows this to be true, that a large advertiser increases the rental and value of every house in the town. More than this he benefits the whole community, for the towns in these days that do not advertise are dead, and might just as well hang out their mourning before the people do it for them.

In an effort to collect delinquent subscriptions, the East Jordan Enterprise uses the following language, which has no uncertain meaning about it: "If the paper is being sent to anyone who does not want it, let him send in right away and have it stopped. A man who would take a paper never intending to pay for it, and sheltering himself behind some paltry excuse, is but a miserable mongrel at the best. He has none of the straightforward qualifications of the right-down answer-to-a-man-like-a-man, al thief, and no one with any respect for the truth would dream of calling him an honest man."

The new postal regulations recently prepared at the postoffice department went into effect Sept. 15, and packages of fourth-class matter (such as samples and packages of merchandise) must not contain hereafter any writing or printing on the face or surface except the name and address of the sender, preceded by the word "from," and the number and the names of the articles inclosed. Otherwise the entire packages will be subjected to postage at letter rates. Heretofore the ruling of the department has been to the effect that any printed matter not having the character of personal correspondence might be attached to such matter.

WAR DE WATERMELON GROWS.

BY BUNT ARNOLD.

I was bo'n wid nuer hair on er stillun,
An' nuer eye nuer de co' on er coup;
An' nights w'en de moon's hint de deadsin',
I know I sho' ketch de spider in er soup!
I know I sho' ketch de spider in er soup!

An' de old hab a sack wid de clothes;
I wuzz till I ketched in de fun-do
Dem I creeps w'ar de watermillun grows.

I wuzz so I 'fis far de white folks,
De ber dat ketch de spider in de soup—
I nuer yet night w'en de old dun scoop
An' I fills up mer sack, shuah's yo' bo'n,
I know I w'ar de chick'n dun roost in de night.

An' I nuer'd w'ar dar's bacon in rows;
W'en man neibber bodder erbout dem pigs
W'en I gits w'ar de watermillun grows.

Er yous will dun preach dat de Jinko dun sa

RUM AND GUNPOWDER IN THE HOLD.

BY FRANK H. CONVERSE.

The worst y'ye'e Ever made? You're asking me a hard one, my lad. For there's different degrees of hard voyaging, so to speak.

I'r instance, a sailor ships in one of these wild packets where the cap'n is a bully and his officers a couple of shades worse. Then you don'e do dock it's a word and a blow, with the blow two minutes before the word. If you get ashore with a stiff in of white bones you haven't had as hard a y'ye as some others that goes to the hospital with smashed jaws or broken limbs.

Or mebbe, foo'-like, you get inveigled aboard a deep-water whaler, though I will say no regiar A B in his sober sense gets caught that way often. Two and perhaps three years you're cruising after sperm, and finally get into port with part of a cargo of oil, your share not being enough to pay your outfit bill. That's a hard y'ye'e!

And so it goes, which, if the dogwatch wasn't high half spent, I might keep illustrating of. But I mind one particler y'ye that was hard enough for me. It was this way:

Being American born and bred, I've mostly sailed under my flag as a matter of principle, d'ye see? American sailors being scarce at best, and our ships fo'c'sles full of dirty foreigners for nigh twenty years past, growing worse all the time.

I did make a cruise in a Chinee junk in '55, but that was entire accident, as some night I'll tell you about. But in '72 I got stranded in London with wages to the States two-pound-ten, and three-pound-five offered foreign. So it came about I shipped in the brig Clara Desmond bound for the west coast of Africa.

I knew tolerable well what part of the cargo was like to be, but I was a little took aback when come to get fairly aboard I see there was a young-ish and an older nest which the steward said was miscarries, goin' out to a mission on the Gaboon River.

"The same old story; rum, gunpowder, and missionaries. I'd rather if were you than me was goin', for you're sure to come to grief somehow," says an old shipmate who came down to see me off.

But the missionaries wasn't to blame for the cargo, was they? In point of fact, as I found out after they didn't know what the cargo was, passage hav ing been engaged for 'em by other parties. But there's a certain class of folks always sneering at religion that likes to represent such things in the worst kind of light.

It was in the middle of March, the toughest time in the year on the English coast, in my way of thinking.

We had a fairish wind through the Straits of Dover, and then it chopped round dead with half a gale blowing, and that thick you couldn't see the brig's length half the time.

There was eight of us before the mast, she being a lump of a brig, for English owners are more particular not to have their vessels sail short handed, as well they may, considering the starvation wages. Four were Russians or Roosian Finns, two Irish, and one—the one which begins trouble—hailed from Australia under the name of Boxer, which wasn't his right name any more than mine is Harry Hale. There's some of us fellows in the forecastle that ain't willing to carry a respectable family name along with us.

Boxer had been paid off from a dogwatman and blowed in something like fifty pounds inside of three weeks, so when he come aboard he was that shaky Cap'n Gore wouldn't send him aloft; besides, he was on the ragged edge of delirium tremens! Why, talk about selling one's soul for drink, after he'd been aboard six hours Boxer would have sold his and all his relations' to boot for a glass of liquor. Temperance doctrine with illustrations! A vessel's fo'c'sle is where you'll hear and see 'em, and they ain't stereoption views, either!

From the time Boxer found out there was rum in the hold, I think he grew crazier. He begged like a dog for Cap'n Gore to give him the least drop, but the old man was solid against it, and dosed Boxer with valerian and such. Boxer kept his bunk, and it was all hands on deck the biggest part of the time, so we never mistrusted what he was up to.

First I took much notice of either of the passengers was when we was three days out beating down channel under reefs, somewhere midway betwixt Cape La Hagne on the French coast and Prawle Point off Devon. The oldest of the two, a Mr. King, was sick, of course, but this younger one, a Mr. Venn, didn't seem to have an idea of such a thing.

He was a slim, palish sort of chap, best come to look close at him. I noticed he had considerable muscle and sinew under his white skin. And when all to once he sprung and grabbed hold of the topsl halyards above the rest of the crew hands, and surged down on it with a regular sailor "sing out," "my fine fellow!" I says to myself, "your fingers has been in a tarpot, or I lose my guess."

Being one hand short, Cap'n Gore, though he opened his eyes tolerable wide, make no manner of objection to the passenger taking hold for a pull whenever he liked. And seeing this, Mr. Venn came on deck an hour or two after, without his tail coat and white choker, wearing a regular sailor shirt and Scotch cap.

"I've been to sea some, Cap'n," he says, in a quiet sort of way, "and it'll do me good to stir round with the men a little—I'd like to."

Cap'n Gore stared, and smiled in his dry way, but said nothing. And Mr. Venn did stir round.

We hadn't two reefing jobs before noon—first a single then a double one—but I'm blessed if the young feller wasn't to the weather yard arm hanging on to the lift with a livin' twist ye'd have to hand out, before we men was fairly on the yard.

Yet he didn't forget his profession neither. It was Kelly, the worst swearing man aboard, stood next him, and when Kelly begun his reg'lar cursing, Mr. Venn says:

"Mr. Kelly, your own priest would tell you you were endangering your soul—and the sail doesn't pick up a bit easier, either."

"Hight you are, parson," says Kelly, and Mr. Venn was the "sailor parson" after that with all hands. He knew just what to say and when to say it—and we fellows took to him mightily, specially as all but sleeping fo'ard he filled Boxes place in the watch day and night.

But it was awful weather, and we were two days and nights beating toward Lizard before the Eddystone light showed up. This was early Sunday afternoon, and when the watch was sent below, Boxer wasn't in his bunk.

Now there was only a board bulkhead twixt the fo'c'sle (which was below deck) and the fo'ard hold. Then, somebody noticed one of the boards was loose, whilst there was a tremendous smell of rum in the fo'c'sle itself.

We mistrusted what it meant in a minute. We shoved the board away—and the whole thing comes to me now like a photograph.

What with the rolling and pounding, some of the upper tier of the cargo had shifted. Three or four of the powder kegs was stove atop of the punchcons and casks of rum, and there sat Boxer in the middle of 'em. One of the half empty kegs was jammed down into the fo'c'sle and tied in his bunk.

But all this while the mate was in charge of the deck, and the wind hauling further and further to the southward and easterly, was driving the brig to lee'ard. And just as Cap'n Gore run on deck the reefed foresail bust and blowed into rags in a twinkling.

The brig's sails were old sa'sway, and the fore-staysail went flying after the foresail. And before we could get new ones bent the Clara Desmond was drifting to lee'ard to'ard Burr Island, where the breakers ran half masthead high the far as we could see.

There's a low water shoal of shifting sands within two cables' lengths of the island, and there the brig took bottom—for she would not answer her helm without headsail, and in a wind and sea that was fearful, to put it mild. The mainmast went by the board, and Captain Gore, with the mate, a Cornishman named Penrith, was swept away high the sarse sea, along of two of the crew.

One of our boats was stove, and the other was no good any way, though the parson he was still under cover and shoard, tried to get us to put it over, for the second mate, Mr. Fields, was laying to windward with a broken leg, and there was nobody to take charge.

But, speaking for myself and the rest as far as I could see, we were shoot mad up, and, sailor-like, couldn't set any chance of saving ourselves or being saved. Then, of a sudden, through the driving murk and spray, comes an English life-boat that had been towed from somewhere nigh Plymouth by one of those little sidewheel iron steamers that we Americans make fun of sometimes.

The brig was breaking up aft fast, but the lifeboat managed to get under the bows and somehow get a line to the outboard, and I'll say this—I never saw such work done before or since, for the ebbing tide made a sea that was perfectly awful.

It was the parson who was first to see the signals from the life-boat's cox'swain, and out he went on the stump of the bowsprit with a coil of the jib halyards.

"Now then, boys," he sung out, and while we made our way out and one by one slipped down into the boat, he kept fast hold of the bowsprit. Then he got the jib halyards in Boxer's hands, and down Boxer came in a heap in the bottom of the boat.

But no one paid attention to him. One of those wild green seas came higher than the foremast head, came swooping down to windward of the brig. "Hold on all!" was the cry, and only for the lifeboat being one of those self-righting and self-bailing ones, I wouldn't be here telling this yarn.

We hung to the lifeline along the gunwale as she capsized, but the painter parted, and she was swept toward shore. Before the breakers were reached they righted the boat, and we were dragged up on the beach more dead than alive.

The parson? We never saw him again. Mr. King only said, in a feeble sort of way, after he knew the truth, something about "laying down one's life for a friend." But did Mr. King mean himself or did he mean Boxer, whom perhaps Mr. Venn had known as some one else?

I only know this—Mr. Venn preached the biggest missionary sermon on record. The night of March 13, 1872. Aye, aye—strike eight bells there, fo'ard!

Love of Country.

MY DEAR NEPHEW: I am glad to know that you are interested in history, and especially glad that you are systematically studying the history of your own country. There is no doubt that you will derive much profit, for the history of your country, from the time of Columbus to Cleveland (I have no reference now to Ohio), is a morally charming narrative. I see you have passed the colonial period and are now engaged in reading about some of those great intellectual giants who flourished some fifty years ago. All it is quite natural that you should indulge in some comparisons and in studying the lives and characters of such men as Clay, Webster, Jefferson, Jackson, Calhoun, and others, should look about you to see who are the men that in force of intellect and strength of character, are filling their places today.

Well, I am sorry to say I can't just now call their names. We have plenty of big, smart scoundrels who are ready to organize a party, pack a convention, or gen a ball through a caucus, and there is hoodle enough behind it to make it worth bothering about; but of the old-fashioned statesmen and men—those grand old fellows who always took their letters "Esquire" and didn't monkey with mixed drinks, and who could make speeches good enough to use in the school readers—alas! they are none such now. Nice reading for the young men of this country, and its aim's speech be nowadays! In those days patriotism that fired the heart, that made the blood run quicker in your veins, was not called "spread-eagle" and rot, but was worth ten hundred cents on the dollar, and never went begging. In those days a man who couldn't whistle "Yankee-doodle" was not permitted to live in a decent community. Now a man who knows it wouldn't think of whistling it where any one could hear him, for fear some one would poke fun at him. I admit it is not much of a tune, but yet for the sake of the sacred associations that cluster about it, it should never be permitted to fall into oblivion.

I often think if this country is so attractive to so many thousands of foreigners that it must be a pretty doubtful good country after all. And I think we Americans, I mean we who were born here, ought to take a little more pride and interest in it. It take time to study it history and its splendid institutions, and try to better discharge our duties as free citizens of the greatest and best country on the face of the earth. I hold that every child in this country should know something about the lives of Washington and Lincoln by the time it is six years old, and as it grows older should be thoroughly posted in the authentic lives of United States. Old as I am I every once in a while get down my history and read again the story of the Revolution, the war of '12, the Mexican war, or even about still later events.

But I must close. Your Aunt Martha says she hears a cat around the milk pans in the pantry and wants to take the lamp to see about it. Yours in haste,

UNCLE SAM.

UNION VETERANS.

Work of the Grand Army National Encampment at St. Louis.

Official Reports---Columbus, O. the Next Place of Meeting.

General John P. Rea, of Minnesota, Chosen as Commander-in-Chief of the Organization.

Sketch of the New Commander-in-Chief.—John Patterson Rea was born in Chester County, Pennsylvania, Oct. 13, 1840, and enlisted in Piqua, Ohio, in Company B, Eleventh Ohio Volunteer Infantry, April, 1861, for three months. Aug. 18, 1861, he enlisted for three years in the First Regiment Ohio Cavalry, and was promoted Sept. 23, 1861, Second Lieutenant; March 12, 1862, First Lieutenant; April 1, 1863, Captain; was brevetted Major for gallantry in battle Nov. 23, 1863. He joined the G. A. R. at Piqua, Ohio, in December, 1866, and was a member of the first department encampment of Ohio. He became a charter member of George H. Thomas Post, No. 84, Department of Pennsylvania, October, 1867, and was successfully Post Captain, Post Commander, member of the Department Council of Administration, and one of the Pennsylvania delegates to the National Encampment in 1872. He was also a member of the commission that erected the soldiers' monument at Lancaster, Pa. In 1875 he removed to Minnesota, and has been Commander of Morgan Post No. 6, Department of Minnesota, and Senior Vice Department Commander two terms. He was elected Senior Vice Commander-in-Chief at Detroit in 1884 and 1885. He served as Captain of Company A, First Regiment, Minnesota National Guard, from 1879 to 1882, and was Quartermaster General of Minnesota from 1883 to 1886, with the rank of Brigadier General.

COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF JOHN P. REA.

At the close of the war Captain Rea had served about three years and four months service, and had been absent only ten days, and was one of the three who served as three on the sick list. In 1865 he entered the Ohio Agricultural College at Dalaware, Ohio, and completing the classical course, graduated in June, 1867, having the vacation of 1866 he entered the office of the Hon. J. Dickey Lancaster, Ohio, as a law student and was admitted to the bar in 1868. On April 12, 1869, President Grant appointed Captain Rea Assessor of Internal Revenue of the Sixth District of Pennsylvania, which office he held until it was abolished by law in 1873. He continued living in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, until 1875, when he moved to Minneapolis, and became one of the editors of the Minneapolis Tribune, remaining in that profession for two years. He then resumed law practice, but in November, 1884, he became the owner of the Crookston Journal, and was re-elected in 1879. Declining a nomination in 1880, he again resumed practice, forming the firm of Rea, Rea, Wesley & Kitchell, afterward Rea Kitchell & Shaw. In the summer of 1880 Governor Hubbard appointed Captain Rea Judge of the Ninth District, to fill the unexpired term of Judge M. B. Koon, resigned, and at an election in the following November Judge Rea was chosen for the remainder of the term, for a term of six years he has served prominently in the Grand Army affairs, both local and National. From Commander of a local post he rose to the office of State commander in 1885, and was elected Senior Vice Commander-in-Chief at the National Encampment held in Minneapolis in 1886. He is also a member of the Loyal Legion.

National Encampment G. A. R.

The convention of delegates to the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic met at St. Louis, Mo., on Sept. 28, Gen. Fairchild, Commander-in-Chief, presiding. Committees were appointed and the work of organization proceeded quietly. The adjutant general, Gen. Farnsley was presented, and announced the evidence of permanent and healthy growth of the Grand Army of the Republic and of the strong love of the country which prompts every from each post as they filed by in company front. Rain came in torrents then the foremost head, came swooping down to windward of the brig.

"Hold on all!" was the cry, and only for the lifeboat being one of those self-righting and self-bailing ones, I wouldn't be here telling this yarn.

We hung to the lifeline along the gunwale as she capsized, but the painter parted, and she was swept toward shore. Before the breakers were reached they righted the boat, and we were dragged up on the beach more dead than alive.

The parson? We never saw him again. Mr. King only said, in a feeble sort of way, after he knew the truth, something about "laying down one's life for a friend." But did Mr. King mean himself or did he mean Boxer, whom perhaps Mr. Venn had known as some one else?

I only know this—Mr. Venn preached the biggest missionary sermon on record. The night of March 13, 1872. Aye, aye—strike eight bells there, fo'ard!

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND.

His Journey Westward from the National Capital to the "Future Great,"

Receptions at Indianapolis and Terre Haute and in Missouri.

The President's journey west to St. Louis was accomplished, according to the programme previously laid down, without accident. Leaving Washington on Friday, the 30th ult. the train reached Columbus, Ohio, early on the morning of Saturday, the 1st of October, but stopped only long enough to change engines. At Richmond, Ind., a stop of a few minutes was made, and the President went out on the platform and shook hands with all who could get to him. At Indianapolis a stop of three or four hours was made. At the State House a stand had been erected to which the President was conducted, and a speech of welcome was made by Governor Gray. The President responded, complimenting the State of Indiana and its capital, and paying a handsome tribute to the memory of Vice President Hendricks. In concluding, President Cleveland thanked the people for their hearty demonstrations in honor of himself and party, and was soundly cheered. After the speech-making the President was taken to a house and there he was kept for a half hour, when he was conducted to the Union depot in a carriage, and half poured down the lines of parade passing soldiers. Missouri's contingent was quite numerous in number, fifty, Illinois' was fifteen minutes, and Kansas' twenty. The day train was made up of sleeping posts and regiments, Gens. Fairchild and Dow, Rocky Mountain and other old veterans, moved to the boys as they passed, acknowledging enthusiastic but less cheers than went up from each post as they filed by in company front. Rain came in torrents then the foremost head, came swooping down to windward of the brig.

"Hold on all!" was the cry, and only for the lifeboat being one of those self-righting and self-bailing ones, I wouldn't be here telling this yarn.

Flights of Genius.

"You look," said an Irishman to a pale, haggard smoker, "as if you had got out of your grave to light your cigar, and couldn't find your way back again."

A schoolmaster, describing a moneylender, says: "He serves you in the present tense, he lends you in the conditional mood, keeps you in the subjective, and ruins you in the future." A clean tobacco or human nature remarks: "Time marches on, with the slow, measured tread of the morning of Saturday, the 1st of October, but stopped only long enough to change engines. Heroic War Correspondents.

When Picton's body was found after Waterloo it was found he had been concealing a severe wound he had received at Quatre Bras. But I know a sailor who lost Russia correspondent, who, with a bullet-hole in his thigh, kept the field and did his work through a fortnight of the Servian campaign of 1876, till he was finally killed in front of a battery above Alexinatz. Mr. Leger Herbert, sore wounded when riding with Herbert Stewart in the cavalry fight at Kirbekan, dictated a long and brilliant telegram to the Times while lying on his back waiting for his turn of the surgeon. Just before the Russo-Turk war formally opened Macgahan had his ankle-bone broken by a fall from his horse. When I first met him, as he came again, was pacing, he was limping about with the help of a stick. Macgahan, I forget, died before for a moment did he regard himself in the least incapacitated by an injury which would have invalided him out of twelve men. In the face of my protests he accompanied Gorbtch's adventurous raid across the Balkans soon after the crossing of the Danube. He passed through that narrow defile of the Hankio pass his horse slid over a precipice, and he fell half Balaam's half-set bone was broken again. But the gallant American dislocated his shoulder by his saddle-bow, he could ride no more, but he quickly made them a bed of rushes on a litter, and he went through the whole adventurous expedition, being invested in a sedan chair, and, when at once all but falling into the hands of the Turks, yet never losing his humor, and, with unequaled for hurt, and inability to do anything for himself—neglecting not a jot of work owed to his newspaper.—Sell's Dictionary of the World's Press.

Artificial Climate.

In the belief that modern science can command climate, Dr. B. W. Richardson proposes that British invalids be given in their native isles the warm advantages of tropical resorts. This he would accomplish by establishing winter homes, or health palaces, each containing fifty or more comfortable factory houses, inclosed in a large square of ornamental grounds, and provided with library, reading room, amusement halls, etc. Flower-lined galleries, giving long promenades, half of the last century, and from him comes the term "mesmerized" as applied to making by using stones heated to proper temperature.

CHANCELLOR, an English captain, first sailed into the White Sea in 1553, and found the Russian port of Archangel and the commerce of Russia.

THE glare of the electric lights in the Czar's winter palace has proven very injurious to the ornamental plants.

The Correct Time.

There are very few men who do not pride themselves on being punctual to the minute, and wonderful and delicate mechanisms are devised to assist them in this, and to be more delicate a chronometer is made than any other, and yet more is consequently lost if unless it be kept always perfectly clean it is liable to stop altogether. It is a fact, that the human mouth is more liable to be unclean than any work of man—and respect this fact, and keep your chronometer clean. The liver is the mainspring of this complex machine, and if it ceases to purify the blood by a disordered liver depend most of the life fluid is lost. Even consumption (which is long scrofula) is traceable to a disordered liver. Biliousness, Bilious diseases, skin diseases, sick headache, heart disease, dropsy, and a long catalogue of other maladies have their origin in a torpid or sluggish liver. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery by establishing a healthy, normal action of the liver, is the sure and speedy cure and preventive of these diseases.

FARM AND GARDEN.

HOW GEESE MUST BE MANAGED TO INSURE PROFITABLE RETURNS.

The Preservation of Garden Seeds—All About the Popular Pyrethrum Insect Powder—Barbed Wire Fences with Growing Trees for Supports.

In the constructing of barbed wire fences is sometimes happens that growing trees are used as posts for support. If the wire is fastened directly to the tree, as some have practiced, the growth of the tree buries it in the bark and wood, where the presence of continual moisture and the retention of the water of every shower tend to produce rusting, and renewing, if ever necessary, is rendered difficult.

FIG. 1—BARBED WIRE ON TREES.

The accompanying figures represent a mode which has been successfully adopted for using growing trees as posts for the support of barbed wire fences and recommended by The Country Gentleman. The usual objections to barbed wire on trees in this mode are obviated, as will be seen in the cut, by placing a narrow board or plank against the face of the tree, securing it with two or three nails, and then fastening the wires to this board, as shown in the figures. A board or plank three or four inches wide answers the purpose, and it may be pine or cedar. If the trees to which the wire is fastened are in a line where there is no danger of animals becoming injured with the barbs, four wires will make a good and durable barrier. But if injury is feared from the wire to cattle and horses, a visible obstruction must be provided, such as a small rip rap wall, which may be eighteen or twenty inches high, more or less, the stones being laid loosely in a straight line (see Fig. 1). This plan will in most cases serve as well as a regularly laid wall of stones. Animals are not disposed to travel on the stones.

FIG. 2—BARBED WIRE ON TREES.

But, says the authority quoted from, if stones are not to be had and the trees are not further apart than the length of fence boards, the fence may be rendered visible by nailing a board between the two upper wires, as shown in Fig. 2. There is still another way to prevent. This harm to animals which run in adjacent fields. This is to cut or plow a small open ditch on each side and raise a bank of earth between them and under the line of the fence. But this cannot be adopted for trees, as the roots will prevent the plowing of the furrows. When posts are set it is easy and efficient way to protect animals, as they are held in check by the ditches and the bank of earth; and it obviates the use of the lower wire, and the posts being held by the bank need not be set so deep.

When it is desired to raise a barbed fence through wooded or other plantation where the trees are not in a straight line care must be taken to have each tree stand in the obtuse angle which it forms, the wire being always placed on the outside where it will be firmly held in position.

The great convenience and economy of using growing trees instead of posts is an additional inducement for planting narrow timber belts at the boundaries of the principal fields.

Pyrethrum Insect Powder.

Powdered pyrethrum, sold under various names, as buhach, Persian insect powder, Dalmatian insect powder, etc., has the past few seasons grown steadily in favor as an insecticide in farm and garden. It has, in a word, assumed sufficient importance to entitle it to a familiar acquaintance with every farmer and every housewife. Some confusion exists owing to the number of names by which pyrethrum is introduced in our markets. That grown in the United States, notably in California, is sold under the name of buhach. The imported powder, Pyrethrum roseum, is grown in the region south of the Caucasus mountains, and is known in commerce as Persian insect powder, while that grown in Dalmatia is termed Dalmatian powder.

Pyrethrum is not poisonous to higher animals, hence its present popularity among those who dislike to handle such poisons as London purple and Paris green. While not a poison to man and beast, pyrethrum has proven a valuable remedy for many farm and household pests. Its active principle is a volatile oil which acts on the nervous system of the insect. The powder should be kept dry and stored in closed packages until required for use.

It is employed both dry and in solutions. At the Ohio Experiment Station the best results have been gained with the dry powder diluted not more than five times with flour, finely slaked lime or other finely powdered substance. At this station the powder is thoroughly mixed with the diluent and allowed to stand for twenty-four hours in a closed vessel before using to gain the best results. It is applied with a good hand bellows. From the experience at this station it is believed that pyrethrum will be found most beneficial for smooth bodied caterpillars, such as cabbage worms and others like them. On the woolly caterpillars it had little or no effect and did not prove a sure remedy for bee-lice.

On the experimental grounds of The Rural New Yorker, where preference is given to the California buhach, successful results have been obtained by using the buhach in solution. Mr. Carman, who made the experiments, insists upon the use of a hand force pump and the cyclone nozzle for best effects.

With the above solution applied as here stated, he has been able to destroy the rose bugs, which were present in large numbers this season on his farm. The economy of the use of pyrethrum or buhach, in Mr. Carman's opinion, depends much in its application as a fine spray or vapor, when the same quantity of water will go fifty times as far as if sprinkled on the plants, while the time required to do the work will be perhaps twenty times less. At the Ohio station the powder is applied through a bellows. One pound of pyrethrum diluted with other powdered substance three to five times was found abundant to dust an acre of cabbage.

Directions for Saving Garden Seeds.

Seeds of all kinds, says American Agriculturist, should be fully ripe when gathered, but it is also important to harvest them as soon as they are ripe. For keeping small quantities of seeds, paper bags are preferable to cloth, as they afford better protection against moisture and insects. Always mark each package with the name of the seed contained in it, and the year in which it grew. Cold does not injure the vitality of seeds, but moisture is detrimental to all kinds.

Melon, cucumber, squash and pumpkin seeds should be taken only from ripe, perfect shaped specimens. In a small way the seeds may be simply taken out, spread on plates or tins and dried. Larger quantities will need to be washed before drying, to remove the slime that adheres to them. When the seeds are thoroughly dried, the better ones are obtained, as will be seen in the cut, by placing a narrow board or plank against the face of the tree, securing it with two or three nails, and then fastening the wires to this board, as shown in the figures. A board or plank three or four inches wide answers the purpose, and it may be pine or cedar. If the trees to which the wire is fastened are in a line where there is no danger of animals becoming injured with the barbs, four wires will make a good and durable barrier. But if injury is feared from the wire to cattle and horses, a visible obstruction must be provided, such as a small rip rap wall, which may be eighteen or twenty inches high, more or less, the stones being laid loosely in a straight line (see Fig. 1). This plan will in most cases serve as well as a regularly laid wall of stones. Animals are not disposed to travel on the stones.

FIG. 2—BARBED WIRE ON TREES.

But, says the authority quoted from, if stones are not to be had and the trees are not further apart than the length of fence boards, the fence may be rendered visible by nailing a board between the two upper wires, as shown in Fig. 2. There is still another way to prevent. This harm to animals which run in adjacent fields. This is to cut or plow a small open ditch on each side and raise a bank of earth between them and under the line of the fence. But this cannot be adopted for trees, as the roots will prevent the plowing of the furrows. When posts are set it is an

AGAIN IN LUCK.

The President Has a Pleasant Day's Fishing in Mendota Lake.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND Postmaster General Vilas, Colonel Dan Lamont, Dr. J. D. Bryant, and M. A. Rissell went fishing in Mendota Lake, near Madison, Wis. But a few minutes passed till beautiful yellow bass were one after another brought out wriggling and twisting in a vain endeavor to free themselves from the hook. The President was not without his share of luck. With a light trout rod in hand he deftly guided the line as the fish began to bite, and his patience was soon rewarded by the safe landing of a magnificent specimen of yellow bass. This was quickly followed by others, until seven as fine fish as ever bit had succumbed to his skill. Two of these were large, weighing fully five pounds each. The President was delighted. He said the fishing far excelled anything he ever had in the St. Lawrence country. One particularly fine specimen required fully twenty minutes to land, so large was he and so wary in the plunges after he took the hook. The President and Mrs. Cleveland spent Sunday quietly at the home of Postmaster General Vilas. They had expected to attend church, but were deterred by the indecency of the weather. They left Madison on Monday morning at 9 o'clock for St. Paul.

Virginia Elections General in Fall.

A RICHMOND (Va.) dispatch says that "United States Judge Bond filed Attorney General Mahone's and Readjuster State Attorney John M. Scott of Farquhar County and the State's Attorney of Loudoun County for bringing suits against the 'coupon-crusher' law in disobedience of the injunction issued by Judge Bond. The final officers were committed to jail to remain until the fines are paid. They will apply to the United States Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus."

A company composed of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Chattanooga capitalists has just closed a trade for 100,000 acres of land in Sequatchie Valley. The property is mining property, and the purchasers propose to build several blast furnaces, rolling-mills, and foundries at Chattanooga.

THE visit of Signor Crispi to Prince Bismarck is the cause of much gossip among European politicians. The significant remark of the Italian that Russia stands not make "a Russian lake" of the Mediterranean shows that the meeting of the two statesmen bodes ill for the Czar, and it is evident that that potentate has lost the friendship of Germany.

THE Kissee of the Sultan of Morocco has arrived at some importance because of its possible effect upon European politics. The heir to the throne is a boy of 16, and he has numerous undesirable relatives who would be glad to relieve him of the cares of Government. An internal disturbance in the country might call for interference on the part of England, France, Italy, and Spain, all of which nations have interests there.

In a report to the Agricultural Department at Washington on the relation of forests to forest supplies and forestry, Mr. M. G. Kerr computes that the maximum of existing railroad and telegraph lines requires the extinction of about 200,000 acres of timber land annually, and that nearly 50,000 acres at time for ever must be set annually to provide for the annual construction of 5,000 miles of track and telegraph lines.

THE WESTERN STATES.

THE ruling of Judge Sawyer, of the United States Circuit Court, at San Francisco, in the case of William Kissane, alias William H. Rogers, and which achieved such wide notoriety owing to the career of Kissane as the Fast, is that it was practically ruled out of court under the statute of limitations. The wanderings of Rogers in Nicaragua and California were set forth, and the task asked that Rogers be restrained from setting up the statute of limitations to prevent the prosecution of its suit. Judge Sawyer, in rendering his decision, reviewed the circumstances of the case, and in a few words announced that the bill in demurrer was sustained. The complaint he deemed insufficient and stale, and no reasonable cause existed for granting the restraining order. He said that after being discharged Kissane was at all times liable to suit under the operation of the statute of limitation, but the suit was neglected to commence an action. The plea of the plaintiff to the effect that the statutes should not apply because Kissane's whereabouts were unknown was disregarded. Judge Sawyer said that even if Kissane did dispose himself and assume an alias, it did not debar him from having the full benefit of the statute.

A DISPATCH from St. Ignace, Mich., says: The Canadian propeller California, bound for Montreal to Chicago, with a miscellaneous cargo and a few passengers, went to pieces Tuesday morning off Grass Cay, forty miles west of here, at the head of Lake Michigan. The account of the disaster is a recital of agonizing scenes, in which the screams of terrified women, the cries and appeals of crew for the hardened sailors, the crash of timbers, and the roaring of the gale were combined with an awful fight for life in the darkness of the cabins, where panic reigned supreme. Pulmotor incidents are not lacking. A young boy who was known to the survivors only as Harry, and who, with his mother, was from Montreal, after the propeller foundered was seen to battle heroically with the heavy seas, endeavoring to keep his mother, who was unconscious, above the waves. Both had life preservers on. Finally, when Harry saw that he could hold on no longer, he threw up his hands, saying: "Poor mother is dead, so I might as well die also," and they sank clasped in each other's arms. There were twenty-seven peoples board the California, thirteen of whom perished. Owen Rourke, wheelman, gives the following story of the disaster: We left Chicago Saturday night and had fair weather until we reached the Beaver Islands. Then the wind changed to the northwest and blew a living gale. The boat was laden with pork and corn. The pork broke loose and floated overboard, and the corn got wet and swelled, which forced the decks off. We left Menominee Sunday morning with terrific force. The wind tore out the fires out, and the engineer had to keep the engines constantly throwing on the water. The coast constantly blew everything in the way. The coast constantly kept in view. We left Menominee at about 1 o'clock in the morning all hands were ordered to the pumps. The engine had been given up, and the passengers and crew gathered in the cabin and put on life preservers. I was pumping for my life, and the decks were struck her and threw over on the starboard side. The water came down, she appeared to strike the bottom, and the hull collapsed with a tremendous crash. Then followed a terrible scene, the awful die of which I cut here yet. One lamp continued burning in the wrecked cabin. The scene between decks defined human description, and children screamed, women fainted, and most of the men cursed and prayed.

CHARLEVOIX, - MICHIGAN.

The State Republican brings forward Russell A. Alger as candidate for the presidency of the United States.

WHAT is to be done with such will men as Johan Most and George F. Train who are pleased to call themselves anarchists, communist and socialists? To them and their class every man who owns property in his own right, even the little house that shelters his wife and children, is a "capitalist". And for the offense of owning property of any kind, men should be blown up with dynamite. While we do not believe in taking human life as punishment, there seems to be but one final end; the people will rise in self-defense and stamp out anarchism in blood. The demand of the socialist is that the industrious and frugal divide with the drunken, worthless foreign scum of Europe, and if not, why then the dagger, the bomb, and the torch.

At a recent socialist meeting in New York, Most was the hero of the day, and in his speech the following language is found: "Friends and anarchists," said he "is it unlawful to have free speech in this country? Was not those men guilty of Are they theives or murderers? [Cries of no, no.] They fought against the murdering police and robbing capitalists. Seven policemen were killed and they want seven of our brothers lives—a life for a life. You cannot allow that hanging to take place. Arm yourselves and for every drop of blood that is shed from our friends let it cost a human life. I am not alone an anarchist, but also a revolutionist. No one shall escape his judges. The twelve jurors, judges, and detective spies will not sleep very well at present. Let them beware! [Wild yells and cheers from the crowd.] The time is approaching when we will be forced to use firearms. It must come; so be prepared. [Bedlam of cheers.] I warn them not to take the lives of our martyrs in Chicago. I demand that they be set free. Let there be a social revolution."

Last week a similar meeting was held in Chicago, and was addressed by Geo. F. Train, whom everybody says is crazy, but who seems to have method in his madness. Among many threats, he declared the anarchists should not hang and if they did he would lead 20,000,000(?) workingmen of Chicago to cut the throats of all connected with such a crime.

General Black's Pension Report.

The annual report of General John C. Black, commissioner of pensions has been sent to the Secretary of the Interior, and printed copies are at hand. The commissioner is to be complimented upon the succinctness and compactness of his work, for the main features of the report may be gleaned by the casual eye. A novel feature is to be found in abstracts of the various pension systems of the world, only Great Britain failing to respond to the commissioner's request for full statements of the pension administration. Even The Chinese were more courteous than was the court of St. James.

The commissioner's recommendations are numerous. Nearly all of them meet the approbation of the reader at sight. General Black thinks that children should get $5 a month instead of $2; that widows' pensions should date from the death of their husbands; that double pensions should be abolished; that a man hurt while sergeant, who fought until he became a colonel, should get a colonel's pension; that dead veterans should get $30 dollars a month; that amputations should be more equitably ruled upon; that drunkards and other unfit persons should not be allowed to draw or spend their pensions, and that two more agencies should be established.

Other matters are worthy of popular note. Although the pension Bureau had but a few months in which to attend to the new Mexican pensioners, over eight thousand of them were accommodated while 14,683 claimants on account of the civil war remain unheard. It has long been the complaint of the soldiers that the Authorities at Washington are slow. But the rate of 8,000 new pensions in five months after passage of new law shows an alacrity which the old folks of Polk's time must sincerely appreciate.

Uncle Sam has now an army of 406,007 pensioners. Every one hundred and fiftieth man draws a pension. In every congregation, convention, school-room, large work-shop and large store in the country, there is a pension who is in receipt of governmental stipend. The mere wagecost of paying out these pension taxes ($2,339,526) exceeds the whole expense of the government previous to the civil war, and we bragged about Columbia even in those days. It took, last year 1,540 people to pay out the pensions and they spent $50,000 for stationery, etc. A noticeable item is the survival of widows of the soldiers of 1812. Although but 1,069 of those soldiers are alive, there are no less than 11,831 widows who still draw their pay.

The tide of new pensioners sweeps in. No less than 57,901 are on the rolls this year who had not reached their heaven at the previous report. Only 17,677 were dropped for all reasons. Therefore, the net gain to taxdrawers was 40,224, truly an enormous number of successful new claimants. Each of the pensioners draws nearly $8 more than were ever before received by army or navy pensioners in all the world. The total of annual charges was nearly fifty three million dollars. The entire payments were over seventy three millions, an increase of nearly ten millions, and $7,000,000 more than the entire expenses of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1861.

The pension payments overtook the interest on the public debt in the year 1883, and the annual pension charge in 1887 exceeded the interest charge by some $8,000,000. But for every dollar so far paid to pensioners the government has spent three dollars in interest, or as $800,000,000 to $2,400,000,000.

There is food for thought in the vast expenditures of this country. The civil and miscellaneous list, which called for only $2,000,000 as late as 1822, now foots up nearly $80,000,000.

Work and Length of Life.

Before the days of science and statistics it was very well known that the character of a man's work and the conditions under which he has to labor make a real difference in the length of life to which he may fairly look forward. But in spite of the increased attention paid to subjects of this kind during the last few years, very few people really recognize how powerful for good and evil these influences are, and they will be astonished at the figures contained in the paper read by Mr. Humphrey before the Statistical society. The results of his investigations went to show that in spite of its mental and moral anxieties the life of a clergyman (taking the term in its broadest sense) is the healthiest. Taking 100 to represent the average death rate between the ages of 25 and 60 the rate among the clergy is only a little more than half, or 55.

Passing to the other extreme we find that the mortality is heaviest among servants employed in inns and hotels, the proportional rate upon them standing at 220. Four of them die for one in the class above, and though late hours, hurry and excitement, and the temptations to excess which beset them might well have led us to expect a very decided difference in their liability to fatal disease, so enormous a disparity could hardly have been anticipated. Farmers, gardeners and agricultural laborers come next in healthiness to the clergy, and after them follows a wide gap, the death rate among them standing at 70, as compared with 185 among the miners of Cornwall, while London laborers suffer more severely still. We are lessening the unhealthiness of the country year by year, but our success is clearly unequal. Within sanitary and occupational is hopeless to look for any great improvement, but in most something ought to be done to diminish the liability to disease, and it is not satisfactory that for every seven loss people who die at Brighton twenty-nine should die at Preston. We must try to make the rate more even, throughout the land.—Sunday Magazine.

Building in Omaha.

Fred. Ames, of Boston, one of the sons of Oakes Ames, is putting up a six story brick building which will cost $180,000. The First National bank building is a seven story granite stone and brick building which cost $500,000, and just opposite this is the Merchants' National bank of eight stories, which is to be made of brown stone, and which will cost $100,000. The Paxton block will cost $400,000, and the Chamber of Commerce on the opposite corner is a fine six story building about completed. Just above this an extension has been made by the New York Life Insurance for a ten story business block which is to cost $700,000, and across the street is to be the new city hall and the new building of The Omaha Bee, each of which will cost about $300,000.

The Omaha Bee building will be erected by Editor Rosewater. Rosewater is an example of young men who have come west and made fortunes. Coming from Sandusky, O., he was a telegraph operator in the war department during the war and was sent west about that time as superintendent of the Western Union telegraph lines here. It was at this time that he bought one-half of the lot upon which he proposes to erect his $300,000 building, paying $800 for what is now worth $50,000. After being in Omaha some time Rosewater, who is a bright fellow, who thinks for himself, dropped into politics and was elected to the legislature. He was against the ring influence of the town, and he needed a paper to bolster up his views. With this idea he started The Bee, intending to let it drop as soon as the campaign was over. He saw, however, that there was a good opening for a newspaper, and he has kept at it until he has now one of the most valuable newspaper properties in Omaha. He runs a morning and evening edition and makes money. He lives well and is a man of influence as well as of means. In addition to the city he has three other dailies, and furnishes his citizens with as good a character of literary matter as you can find in the country.—Western Letter.

Tokio, Japan, is about to be rebuilt, and the harbor is to be enlarged. Brick structures will be erected along the principal streets of the town.

MICHIGAN MENTION.

Hemlock is fast becoming an important article of manufacture in Michigan. It is estimated that 100,000,000 feet will be put in Michigan streams the coming winter.

Government engineers are at work at Sault Ste. Marie surveying sites for the proposed canal on the Canadian side of the river. The canal will be fully a mile long and two locks will be required, the total fall between the upper waters of Lake Superior and the lower reaches of the St. Mary's being eighteen feet.

THE state grange pledges itself to resist the collection of royalty on drive wells in Michigan, and will defend all who will contribute one dollar to the defense fund. This is a very wise and proper thing to do. The patent shark will not be quite so impudent in his demands, we anticipate, when he learns of this action.

The University attendance is now 1,507, against 1,442 for the corresponding date last year, divided as follows: Literary department, 656; medical, 305; law, 291; dental, 103; pharmacy, 90; homeopathic, 64. The attendance will reach 1,650 to date. The increase in the literary department is 28; pharmacy, 28; dental, 24, and homeopathic, 5.

It has been decided by the circuit court for the county of Lenawee, that it is lawful to hug a girl if the girl is willing. A certain school teacher brought suit for damages against a couple of fellows because he heard they reported that he had his arm around a girl. The court decided that a report of that kind did a man no harm, that if he really did hug the girl he committed no offense, and that he had no right to kick if the lady didn't.

Manson Nelson, of St. Ignace returned to his home late one night last week and was about to shoot his wife when she took refuge in the house of Mr. Latscha, a neighbor. Nelson followed her and fired three or four shots, one passing within two inches of Mrs. Nelson's head, striking a door, another striking Mr. Latscha in the head, making a scalp wound. Mr. Latscha to defend himself and family got an old revolver and fired at Nelson, the shot taking effect in his shoulder and he will undoubtedly die.

At a meeting of the state board of health held at Lansing, last week Dr. Vaughan reported on the recent cases of tyrotoxicon, or milk-poisoning, near Milan. He said he had examined the stomach and intestines of one of the victims, and found tyrotoxicon enough in them to kill a cat. Upon investigation the doctor found that the house in which the poisoning occured had been built over 50 years ago, and that the floors when they rotted away, had been covered with a new layer of boards and the old decompose. When the top floor was taken up a terrible smell arose from the matter beneath. The doctor placed milk in the closet, and when it was examined some time afterward it was found to contain the poison. Some of the soil was placed in the milk and this also upon later examination was found to contain tyrotoxicon.

The state board of health is in receipt of some startling information regarding the looseness of the quarantine laws. On the second of the present month a Norwegian family which had crossed the ocean on the Ohio, of the Inman line, reached Sutton's Bay, Leelanaw county, with one child ill with scarlet fever, and, as the result, an epidemic of this dreadful disease is now in progress at Sutton's Bay. The board learns that several people were sick with the fever on board the Ohio; nothing was done to quarantine the vessel or to keep the people on board from carrying the germs of the disease ashore. Each passenger was, however, given a certificate showing he had been vaccinated, although physicians agree that the death rate is always larger in scarlet fever than in small-pox.

There is much excitement and almost a panic at Sutton's Bay.

Some Good Salaries.

The emperor of Russia has a salary of $3,250,000; the sultan of Turkey, $6,000,000; the emperor of Austria, $4,000,000; king of Prussia, $3,000,000; King Humbert, $2,400,000; Queen Victoria, $2,500,000; Isabella of Spain, $1,800,000; Leopold of Belgium, $500,000, and President Cleveland, $50,000.

Poisoned Arrows of South America.

Near the Goajiros, on the south, are the Motilones, a race of natives still fierce than their neighbors. They are reported to be polygamists and cannibals; making periodical war upon the nearest tribes to obtain a supply of women, and to provide themselves with food—i. e., the rest of the planet.

A gentleman of Maracaibo gave me a half dozen poisoned arrows from these natives, and one of their bows. The latter is of some brownish wood, not very strong nor elastic, for it is not necessary that its projectile should go very deep. The arrows are made of single joints of bamboo, with barbless points upon which some variety of woorara has been rubbed, which still retains its venom. An experiment upon a dog showed them to be as dangerous as when first dipped. The animal in two minutes after being wounded with a tip, stripped, lost its power of struggling, from suspension of heart's action. When struck by this poison, animals slipped as if paralyzed, rarely moving until they fell; which makes it invaluable to hunters who must bear their game through the dense undergrowth of a tropical jungle, and would lose nine-tenths of it if it merely dered at once incapable of motion.—Dr. W. F. Hutchinson in The American Magazine.

Children of the Gypsies.

Along with uncomacious native ethical superfluous come such physical ones as we advanced people know nothing of. Because the gypsy mother and father are healthy perfect types of good health healthy children are born to them. Because every gypsy woman on earth is loyal to her mate many children are born to them. Because the instinct of fatherhood, motherhood and partnerhood is inviolable with husband and wife gypsies love this to be so, and the care and affection for gypsy children are remarkable. From the moment the babe is born until it is upon its own legs for good it is constantly rubbed and stretched and kneaded, that every muscle may have proper action and development. The same noble practice exists among the Pennsylvania Dutch. It began with the latter behind the Swiss mountains centuries ago, and it would be an interesting research for the student of men to ascertain if this precisely identical gypsy and Pennsylvania Dutch custom had not at some time the same Oriental origin beyond the Himalayas.—Edgar L. Wakeman's Letter.

A gentleman of Maracaibo gave me a half dozen poisoned arrows from these natives, and one of their bows. The latter is of some brownish wood, not very strong nor elastic, for it is not necessary that its projectile should go very deep. The arrows are made of single joints of bamboo, with barbless points upon which some variety of woorara has been rubbed, which still retains its venom. An experiment upon a dog showed them to be as dangerous as when first dipped. The animal in two minutes after being wounded with a tip, stripped, lost its power of struggling, from suspension of heart's action. When struck by this poison, animals slipped as if paralyzed, rarely moving until they fell; which makes it invaluable to hunters who must bear their game through the dense undergrowth of a tropical jungle, and would lose nine-tenths of it if it merely dered at once incapable of motion.—Dr. W. F. Hutchinson in The American Magazine.

The Man Who Stayed Dead.

Just beyond Crosby hall, passing under an arch, we found Great St. Helen's, one of the oldest churches in London, and were well repaid for our trouble. It is simply a square divided into two aisles by massive pillars; its floor an ancient pavement of stones, a part of which are gravestones. Having been in very early times connected with a nunnery, the stairs leading to the dormitories lead directly into the church, and at one side stone gratings are shown where the nuns came to listen to the service. There are many curious ancient tombs here, one being a very large square edifice, standing out into and about filling one aisle at that point. Being very peculiar, we questioned its meaning, and were told that it was built by a Mr. Francis Bancroft for himself; that his coffin was to be put there with the lid so that he could lift it, as he had a great horror of coming to life after burial. He also had a key to the tomb and one to the church left there, and a vessel of water, and he left money to certain men to visit the tomb once a year. But as our guide said: "He is only a dry skeleton now, and has not been visited for fifty years."—London Cor. Boston Traveler.

Ghastly Relics.

There recently passed under the examination of the custom house officials of Philadelphia a number of cases of curiosities and relics sent by the United States naval officers attached to the South Pacific squadron to some of their relatives and friends in Washington. The articles had been gathered on cruises among the islands of the South Pacific and along the western coast of South America. One of the boxes was filled with human skulls, a number of which appeared to be very old. Three of them were labeled, "Skulls of kings of the Easter Islands." The earliest decided war clubs, arrows made of reeds and tipped with bone, spears with long barbs, bound with cord to the shaft, a pear shaped mace of stone about a foot long, pieces of South American pottery, the jaws of a large shark, etc.—Boston Transcript.

Reading on Railway Cars.

Perhaps as effective a way of expending nervous force as can be devised, is reading on railway cars. The busy drive of American life, wherein each minute has a definite value in coin, makes our business men anxious of time, and of a hundred coming down town or into town of a morning, it is safe to say that seventy-five will be reading a newspaper. What with the jerky jar of the train, sudden stops and dusty atmosphere, the retina is kept in a constant oscillation to accommodate itself to rapidly varying conditions, and a nervous irritability is set up in the brain that starts the day badly. It is better for us let one's eyes rest quietly, focused upon some distant picture of green tree or cool meadow through a car window; or, if in town, to study human nature from some of the many leaves that a home car is continually turning in and out.—American Magazine.

A THINK OF THEE.

BY A. CRESS PRITSCH.

I think of thee, my sweet, my own,
When daylight wakes, when night comes on,
When stars peep brightly, one by one,
And I sit with my thoughts alone.
Can I forget thee? Never!
Though time and fate may sever
My lot from thine, I think of thee as one;
My love has grown as years roll on.

I think of thee, my own, my love,
When the first sun rays from above
Kiss the dew-drops on the flowers and dove
That hides by nest within yon grove.
Can I renounce thee ever?
No sooth to thine forever
Is bound by holiest ties that mock at death,
That break not with life's fleeting breath.

I think of thee 'mid winter's snows,
Smile of thee when crimson glows
The cheek of June's fair child, the rose;
When leaves fall, when spring days close.
Distance and time may sever
My lot from thine, still our allegiance never Shall unloose thy love in change careless fever
Unalterable and true, whatever my fate may bring.

Can I forget thee, when death's cold hand
Shall bear me to the land to that fair land,
Where "rest is heart and peace in hand
In deathless union we may stand?
Can I forget thee, dearest?
Then to my heart the nearest,
When mothers weep their children, when over the shore,
Sighs mingle with their wailings; when over the tide
Pass, Love, will I forget thee.

IN THE BRAVE DAYS OF OLD.

The picture hangs upon the wall of my sitting-room; the room that overlooks the Channel. From its windows, when the atmosphere is favorable, I can see the French coast-line; and when there is a gale, and the steamers are plowing heavily in the waves, and the sail-vessels are scudding under bare poles, I love to take my swing or my book into one of the great bow-windows, and enjoy the grand view.

My father built the house so near the sea, because he had been a sailor all his life, and he could not live far away from salt-water. When he died, the place came to me, and the man I married happened to hold an important position in the revenue service, and it was precisely the thing that we should live in this dear old house. So our children were born here, grew up here, and two are buried in the Cliff Cemetery, over yonder. They, the living, are all married now, and living in houses of their own, from land's end to John O'Groat's," but each summer the old home is full of them and their families, and my dear grandchildren, sometimes a dozen of them together, make me young again with their mirth and laughter and charming child-ways.

And the picture?

It hung there in my own childhood; it has hung there ever since. I thought it the bravest, handsomest picture that could be; and not a child nor a grandchild of mine but has been attracted to it from the time that anything was noticed.

No ordinary picture is it, you may be sure. If it had been made in these cheap days of big imperial photographs, and colored lithographs, and gaudy chromos, there would be nothing about it worth five minutes' notice. But if you look in the lower left-hand corner, you will find the mark, "J. L. Pink, 1785," and that I may tell you, was the mark of Sir Joshua Reynolds, the most famous painter of the reigns of the Four Georges.

So it is a painting, and no common one, either. These colors were laid on by a master hand. It is of grand size—six feet by four and a half. I could turn my eyes from it and describe every detail of it. A sailor-boy of twelve, hatless, and fair of face as the pictures of the youthful Byron, sits up on the high main cross-trees of the ship, his back to the mast, his left hand grasping one of the ropes by which he has ascended to this dizzy height, his left foot braced against cross-ropes, his right foot swinging, his right hand resting on the timber of the cross-tree. His fairer hair and the loose ends of his neckerchief are blowing out; yet there is not wind enough below to ruffle the ocean, for far down and far away to the horizon, you see it stretching as placid as a pond. An afternoon is fading about the ship—the only other living creature in sight. There he stands, clinging to the rope, his blue eyes gazing off over the wide ocean—O, so away!

For years past they have come to me, my children and grandchildren, and begged me to tell them about this handsome little sailor.

"There must be some story about him," has been the common remark.

"Indeed there is, my dear, and a good one. You shall hear it.

The time has come when it has been told to all of them; even to little Minnie, who has not yet given up her dolls. So now the great, kind public shall be my children, and for the last time will I relate the story of this brave sailor-boy.

When Captain Jacob Converse was about to leave London with the good ship Cynthia, laden with a great variety of fancy articles for traffic with the natives of the far-off islands of the South Pacific, he bethought him that he had not secured him a cabin-boy.

"And what d'ye want of a cabin-boy?" asked his gruff mate, Mr. Hinds.

"A cabin-boy is mostly a little varlet who learns nothing aboard ship but to be lazy, to steal the goodies out of your locker, and to tell tales of you to the fo'castle. I wouldn't have such a fellow aboard.

"But the Captain and Mr. Hinds differed on this subject, as they did on almost every other. Captain Converse was a mild and merciful man, who knew something by experience of the hard lot of the sailor, and wished to make it easier. Mr. Hardy, on the contrary, had just one theory about Jack Tar—namely, that he was a worthless guzzler ashore, and a lazy, sulky animal afloat, and that all that could be got out of him at sea was what he got at the rope's end. He never gave an order but with an oath, and the day on a voyage when he did not knock down a seaman, either he did not know how to handle his ship, or else he was drunk.

Captain Converse deplored his bad temper and savage ways, and had often seriously talked with him on the subject; but he could not be changed. The fact was, the Captain was too easy a man to be in authority anywhere, and especially over such a tyrannical brute as Hardy. The crews of his ships loved everything, because the Captain had not force of character enough to interfere between the mate and the men, and he kept Mr. Hardy in place because he found him useful; his knowledge of navigation was great, and he had sailed in almost every known sea.

Against his protest, the Captain engaged a cabin-boy for this voyage. He was the orphan grandson of one of the legless veterans of the Royal Navy, and he had been about Greenwich Hospital so much, and heard so many stirring stories of the sea from the disabled and superannuated tars laid up there, that he was longing to make a voyage. Captain Converse liked his bright looks and manly talk, and took him on this voyage. The boy's name was Rodney Barre.

It is not necessary to the proper understanding of the story that all that befell the ship and her crew on the voyage down the Atlantic and round the Horn should be told. It was then a voyage of many weeks, as it is now, mine lad. The Captain was mild and easy as ever; the mate was quite as brutal as he had ever been known to be, and the quick, bright cabin-boy kept his eyes and ears open and learned something new every day about sea-faring.

It was when the Cynthia had got well up in the low latitudes of the Pacific that a great disaster happened.

For a week the Captain had been confined to his berth in his cabin by a low, listless ship-fever. In that week he was unable to visit the deck, and Rodney was busy attending to him. The ship's chest had a few simple drugs and remedies, of which every sailor-boy was supposed to know the use, and Captain Converse attempted to prescribe for himself. He did not make much of a success of it.

I think that if he had known half the shockingly ill-treatment that the mate was dealing out to the sailors he would have got upon deck some way and stopped it; but he did not, and Mr. Hinds' brutality went on till the catastrophe came.

It came on still, quiet night, when the ship was barely moving through the water. The Captain was slightly delirious, and Rodney was awake as most the whole night, wetting his head, and giving him powders and drinks. About midnight the cabin-boy heard strange noises from the deck. There were shouts and cries, a pistol-shot; and later, the sound of oars in the water, rounding the ship's stern. Rodney looked out through the bulls-eye window, but the night was dark, and nothing was in sight.

He thought he would go cautiously on deck and reconnoiter. He tried the cabin-door, and found it locked.

When the long hours of the night had passed, the Captain woke from his slumber and was conscious. The boy told him what he had heard.

"Something dreadful has happened," the Captain groaned. "Take a hatchet from the locker, break the lock of the door, and find out what's wrong."

Something very dreadful had happened, and Rodney was not long in finding it out. The mate was propped up against the foremast, with two knives driven through his breast and a bullet hole in his head. A white paper, pinned to his coat, scrawled over with rude characters, which the boy deciphered as follows:

"Sir Capt.: We likes you, and we likes you just you not the boy; but this here brute had to be put where the devil will giv him the rope's end. We start him on his vigs, and we goes our ways.

Fair well, and may you make port safe.

All around this queer letter were signed the names of the seamen, in round-robin style, so that, in case they were caught, the names of the ringleaders would not be known.

Rodney looked from the horrible spectacle of the deck and saw that there was a dead calm. The sea was like glass. The sails of the Cynthia slip flapped from the yards. Not another sail was in sight. The mutinous and murderous crew had taken the longboat and the jolly-boat and were now far beyond call or sight.

Rodney took the paper and went back to the cabin. The Captain, weak and sick as he was, helpless and unnerved, heard the boy's account and felt back groaning on his pillow.

"God be merciful to us!" he cried. "It is a judgment upon us for not putting between Hinds and my poor sailors. I know my duty, and I did it not. We shall starve; we shall drift helpless till the storms carry us to the bottom. Poor innocent that you are, I have involved you in my punishment."

Rodney Barre was but twelve years old; but "the child is the father of the man," and the hero-spirit of his later years began to shine out in him. He talked cheerfully and soothingly to the sick Captain, and told him what he thought he could do. There would be no danger, he said, while the calm continued; and, before a gale came up, he hoped to signal some vessel and get relief.

"How, I'd like to know?" fretfully interrupted the Captain.

"I'll run up the Union-Jack, union down, to the main top-mast."

Well, But there's no water nor food in the cabin lockers, here. Ten to one some of those sailors locked up the bulkhead door and threw the key overboard. How will you get to the hatch, sweet, salt-junk, and water casks?"

"I can find an axe," said Rodney. "I'll break in."

"Good," said the Captain, drowsily. "Take command of the ship, lad; I can't stay awake. Hinds said I mustn't bring you, but I think the hand of God was in it."

While the Captain slept Rodney bestirred himself. He found the bulkhead door wide open, and brought down into the cabin provisions and water enough for weeks. The disagreeable job of pulling out the knives and rolling the body of the mate overboard was next pre-formed by the boy. Then he got the Union-Jack from the cabin, and stripping it about him under his arms, he went up the shrouds, up the ropes, till he stood on the main cross-beam. He seized the halliards, rove the flag to them, and ran it up to the very peak of the main-mast.

There was no breeze on deck; in that lofty height there was just enough to shake out the folds of the bunting, and show that the union was down, the signa. of distress.

The boy sat down, grasped the rope, and waited. He scanned the horizon in every direction. Nothing appeared but an albatross and some noisy gulls. He knew that the Captain's slumber would continue at least two hours, and he remained aloft to watch. His little soul was strong with hope, was firm with trust in God. His courage and faith were rewarded, for on the horizon at last appeared a white speck; it slowly but steadily grew, it became a sail, it was surely approaching the hulless craft, and Rodney descended to the deck and returned to the cabin, to tell the Captain the joyful news.

Before dark the Cynthia was hailed by the good ship Dumbarton Castle, of York, and the Captain-boy boldly told his story through the Captain's speaking-trumpet. Men enough were sent by the Castle to take the Cynthia into port. Ship and cargo were saved, and the cabin-boy received from the owners in England, months later, one hundred pounds for his services.

"But who was the cabin-boy?" the children always asked, at this point.

"Years later," I would say, "he was known as Admiral Sir Rodney Barre, K. N. The events I have described occurred in 1710. When Sir Joshua painted the picture Sir Rodney, as I thought only twenty seven, was a post-captain, and had seen sea-fights in his own ship.

"But how did you get the picture?" would be the next question.

"Well, my dears, it so happened that my Admiral was my father. He married when he was of middle age; I was his only child. God has allowed me so long a span of life that I can tell to the Admiral's great-grandchildren about him."

It was wee Minnie who remarked at this point, looking at the picture:—

"Oh, what a pretty little sailor-boy our grandpa was!"

CLEVELAND.

The President of the United States Makes His First Visit to Chicago.

Thousands Bid Him a Royal Welcome and Do Honor to His Wife.

Visitors Throng the Streets, and for a Time Effectually Block All Traffic.

The President Reviews the Grand Procession and Shakes Thousands of Hands.

[Special telegram from Chicago.]

The President and Mrs. Cleveland were given an enthusiastic reception by the people of Chicago on Wednesday. The arrangements were generally exceedingly well planned, and were carried out without misadventure of any kind. The weather was fair, the streets, the street decorations beautiful and effective, and apparently the best use was made of every hour of the time given to this city by the distinguished visitors. The people upon the streets and in the houses along the route where Cleveland and his wife had to stop were possibly not expected greatly outnumbered those engaged in any signal demonstration of interest in and respect for a public personage that has ever been witnessed in parts. Whatever there may have been of enthusiasm lacking in the demonstration was made up in the generosity of the hospitality of which Chicago has always held sway the day before, all was swept away in one grand, exhilarating rush. The office-holder and office-seeker joined with the citizen and the idle in a mad, but kindly greeting from the sidewalk, was shouted from every window, and waved from every face of humanity that had in its wide range of vision the lineaments of the President. Long before the time for the appearance of the President and his wife, the streets were thronged by many good-humored, good-natured people, who had come to see the President himself more than any other thing, and who had come in the cosmopolitan character of Chicago's population, from every part of the first visit to any great commercial center west of the Alleghanies. The massive buildings, the towering business blocks, the palatial residences, the evidences of general prosperity, the wealth of the people, and the unmistakable air of the Garden City by the lakes, must have impressed him alike. In no other way, probably, be under no other circumstances could so favorable an impression of the Queen City of the Lakes be made upon the President as by the cordial, hearty, and spontaneous greeting of the people.

Following these came the grand procession, the best part according of cavalry, infantry and artillery. Then came various civic societies, the Foresters pushing the most display. The procession was over an hour in passing a given point, and must have embraced at least 25,000 people.

The crowds that turned out to view the procession and get a glimpse of the President was something enormous. All the streets on the line of march were lined with men, women, and children. Window, door-ways, balconies, house-tops, and every available place from which a view could be unencumbered possessed tenants with wonderful tenacity and wonderful stylish equipages and farmers' wagons ran against each other for places where the occupants could see the distinguished guests as they passed. The sidewalks were thronged men, and, in fact, on all the streets the people were in a dense match, enterprising individuals coined money by renting seats constructed on vacant lots, on verandas, and upon the roofs of houses. Every rickety contrivance was drawn down with people, who paid a good price for the privilege of standing upon the top of elevation, perilous to contemplate, and dangerous to bring their necks. The prices charged for seats in some cases were exorbitant, and there were takers for all of them. "Five dollars secures you a good seat," said a man who was the idol of philanthropist, who had fitted up a flat-car with a dozen seats, on the Wabash avenue "Express." "Seats for your accommodation, ladies and gentlemen. The President, ladies and gentlemen. The President, ladies and gentlemen. The President, the whole procession. Get your lady a seat, sir, only five dollars apiece, sir, only five dollars." Every minute the price was lowered, the time seemed to be equal to the occasion, and the crowd was so dense that it was difficult to move a mass of humanity, so that it was with great difficulty that a sufficient space was cleared to allow the pageant to pass through. The decorations were very beautiful, and the display of the banners and bunting was very gorgeous.

When President Cleveland and his party reached the reviewing stand, and leaving their carriages ascended the steps, the people began to confirm the chilly east wind, they found themselves in a position to see the face of their fellow-citizens to the utmost limit.

The appearance of the President was a signal for a long and continuous shout, which continued on the platform stood Mayor Hesler, President Cleveland, Mrs. President Cleveland, Governor Oglesby, and Lieutenant-Colonel Hunter, of the United States army. Mr. Hesler, the Mayor, introduced the President, who arose and bowed, his right hand upon his breast, and from the side of the United States ship Michigan, which was in front of the stand, a salute of twenty-one guns was fired, her rigging covered with men, and the sailors on board of her cheering with all their lungs. Simultaneously with the first gun of the salute, a cannon shot after an interval of a few seconds, was fired from the top of the tower of the Chicago Opera House, and the first gun of twenty-one fired in honor of the President. The President then rose and faced out Mayor Hesler, standing within arm's length of President Cleveland, delivered a long address of welcome.

President Cleveland in beginning his speech in reply to that of the Mayor advanced to the front of the platform and gave forth his words in a clear, ringing voice, which could be heard by the people who were in the front rank of those who had crowded forward with great vigour. Men who had climbed upon the roofs of houses and were using themselves speedily, and with the greatest ease, from one house-top to another in order to get a glimpse of the President, and who were actually falling to the floor. The consequence was that only those who were in the front rank could hear very inaudible to the throng. His speech was received with cheers.

At least the long procession marched away and disappeared from view in the last rear guard passed the reviewing stand the great crowd that had been waiting for the President's appearance began to move, and the struggling individuals would find the breakers which rolled up to the feet of the President. A long battle between the officers and the mob followed. The former suffered rough handling, their coats were torn, their buttons were broken off and pocketed, and when he heard over and grasped one of the many bonnetless of fingers which were thrust up from the street in supplicant fashion, a cheer would go up from the throng. Men hands were shaken, but the supplicants were so multiplied with such rapidity that it was impossible to attempt to satisfy their desires. At efforts to force an entrance for the President's carriage were unavailing. It stood upon the edge of the sidewalk, and he was compelled to walk through the people refused to give way, and the President's "Excuse me, please," was very pressing forward, cried, "Let me through." The President was in a somewhat perilous position, and was in a little he thought, but he was good-natured, and he kept on his way, and he bring the taking his hat off to the people, he discovered that his hat was gone, and he was compelled to

FARM AND GARDEN.

INGENIOUS CONTRIVANCES FOR FEEDING SWINE.

One Estimate of the Relative Value of Dairy Cows—When to Cut Fodder Corn—A Brief History of the Wyandotte Fowls.

It is about five years since the American Poultry association admitted the fowl previously termed Eureka, Scaleright, Cochin and American Scaleright, to the standard as a variety sufficiently established to perpetuate the characteristics claimed for it as an individual. It was then given the name of Wyandotte.

A PAIR OF WHITE WYANDOTTES.

While its origin is obscure it is supposed to have been a cross of the Silver Spangled Hamburg and Dark Brahmas with probably some blood from the Cochin family. It shows its composite origin by prominent characteristics and sport. The plumage is very attractive, being white, heavily laced with black, especially over the breast, the fall alone being solid black. The standard weight given for Wyandottes are 8 1-2 pounds for the mature cock and 7 1-2 pounds for the hen.

The Wyandottes have proven themselves worthy of the early claims made for them and stand today among the best of all purpose fowls for the farmer, though they do not appear to have interfered with the popularity of the Brahmas and Plymouth Rocks. As table fowls the Wyandottes are excellent, their flesh being juicy, tender and delicate. As spring chickens they have proven a first rate breed, for they feather early and mature rapidly. The hens are prolific layers, being exceeded only by the Leghorns, but the eggs produced are small in size—a decided drawback when these are destined for market.

The original Wyandottes afforded a tempting field to the fancier which has not been neglected, as the white Wyandottes with their small rose combs testify. Saving the best white "sports" each season, and mating these, has resulted in some beautiful specimens. Our cut is a fair representation of a pair of white Wyandottes.

Dissolved Bones.

Bones contain about half their weight of phosphate of lime; the other half consists chiefly of organic matter. The phosphate of lime in bones is what is called insoluble phosphate—that is to say, a combination of phosphoric acid with as much lime as it can unite with. One-third or two-thirds of the lime can, however, be taken away and still leave definite compounds. When two-thirds of the lime has been taken away one compound formed is soluble in water, and is called soluble phosphate of lime. In dissolving bones it is found that if enough of acids is added to convert all the phosphates in the bones into the soluble form the whole is converted into a liquid mass, which refuses to dry up and is unfit as manure. This is owing to the organic matter in the bones. There is, therefore, a practical limit set to the proportion of soluble phosphate which dissolved bones can contain. As a rule, in the case of pure dissolved bones not more than half the phosphate is present in the soluble form. According to Dr. Anstikin, high English authority, pure dissolved bone cannot contain much more than 20 per cent. soluble phosphate and from 2 1-2 to 3 1-2 per cent. of ammonia. He claims that "the dissolving of bones in sulphurous acid is a wasteful process, not to be recommended, for by so doing the bones are degraded to the level of mineral phosphates, which supply soluble phosphates more cheaply and more efficiently than bones. If soluble phosphate is wanted for a crop, then the cheapest form of superphosphate is the best thing to apply. If bones are wanted for the crop or the land, then the entered bone, finely ground, is the cheapest form of application. If both are wanted both should be applied separately, but to attempt to combine these advantages by dissolving the bones is to effect a compromise that is not economical. It is really in effect to spoil good bones and to make poor superphosphate."

Treasury Department Whitewash.

One of the best reasons known for white-wash is that called "White House whitewash" and "Treasury Department whitewash." The latter name arose doubtless from the fact that it is the recipe seen used by the lighthouse board of the treasury department. It has been found by experience to answer on wood, brick and stone nearly as well as oil paint, and is, of course, much cheaper. Slake one-half bushel of lime with boiling water, keeping it covered during the process. Strain it off and add a peck of salt previously dissolved in warm water; three pounds of ground rice previously boiled in water to a thick paste, one-half pound of powdered Spanish whiting and a pound of clear glue dissolved in warm water. Mix these various ingredients together and let stand for several days. Keep the wash thus prepared in a kettle or boiler, and when used apply it as hot as practicable with a whitewash brush.

A Word About Potato Scab.

The skin of the potato is a layer of cork cells, and when injured it heals by the formation of a new layer of cork. When the tuber grows in water, or in a wet soil, the cork layer thickens at various points, producing many little warts on the surface and rendering the entire less resistant of decay. If the excess of water continues for a considerable time decay sets in and the starch and tissues of the tuber become disordered. But if the decay is arrested the cork layer forms between the decayed and healthy parts and the potato is "scabby." The trouble is, therefore, the result of excessive moisture from a wet soil or wet weather. Stable manure may increase the moisture and cause the scab, or it may fill the soil with spores of molds or fungi. Some insects, by wounding the cork layer, may increase the trouble. Some saline fertilizers may hinder the growth of fungi.—Connecticut Station Report.

Relative Value of Dairy Cows.

In tests made with ten breeds of cows, by Professor Brown, of the Ontario, Can., Agricultural college, to ascertain the value of the milk, cream, butter or cheese made by them, the following conclusions were drawn from results obtained: The Jersey is far ahead as a producer of cream or butter, with the Ayrshire grade next, while the Ayrshire is the best if the milk is to be sold or cheese is to be made, and the Devon ranks next for the cream maker, and the shorthorn grade close after.

The fact that the cow requires food very nearly in proportion to her live weight would also serve another point for the Jersey and the Ayrshire, the lightest weights yet the most productive, the one in weight of milk and amount of cheese made therefrom, the other in amount of cream and value of butter.

In the Vineyard.

A noted vineyardist sets his vines 6x8 feet, and as they grow thins to 12x8, uses chemical fertilizers exclusively, and gives perfectly clean culture. For stakes he cuts chestnut timber early in August, lets it lie three weeks before trimming, and then saws into stakes 3x3 inches, eight feet long, which lie in a drying house one year. The bottoms are dipped in coal tar before setting.

When to Cut Fodder Corn.

Farm Journal says: "Whether for selling, silling or curing for winter use, it is a waste to cut fodder corn too soon. While in bloom it contains but 15 per cent. of solid matter. When the ears are in milk and the kernels beginning to glaze, it has attained 25 per cent. of solids."

A Cheap Insecticide.

L. E. Tod, of Orange N. J., finds a weak solution of London purple a more effective and much cheaper insecticide than any other known to horticulturists. London purple is the residuum of coloring works and has no commercial value for any purpose except death to insects.

Hog Troughs and Feeders.

The following descriptions, with illustrations, of feeders for hog troughs are reported originally in The Prairie Farmer. To make the trough shown in Fig. 1, put two posts as far apart as the trough is long.

FIG. 1.—FENDER FOR TROUGH.

Make the trough a foot wide and five or six inches deep; fasten it under the fence, projecting two or three inches on the side opposite the hog yard. Get a board, or two boards fastened together by cleats, about twenty inches wide and two inches shorter than the inside of the trough. For a long trough it should be two inches thick. Get two pieces of hard, tough wood, twenty inches long by two thick and three wide. Make these round, and two inches in diameter, for about one-third their length. Nail on both these firmly to the wide board at each end near one side, letting the rounded parts project. Bore a two inch hole through each post three inches from the ground, to receive the rounded pieces mentioned, and which are hinges for the board to swing on. When this board hangs down, the lower part of it is in the trough. In the middle and upper part of the wide board bore a half inch hole. Bore a similar one in the two posts from one end of a narrow board or pole five feet long. Fasten this board or pole to the wide board by putting a bolt through the two holes mentioned, so the board or lever can turn to one side by using the bolt as a pivot. When pouring swill into the trough, turn the upper end of the lever to one side a little and then pull it back from the fence, which swings the wide board forward. Turn the lever back at right angles to the wide board, and the lower end catches on the upper front edge of the trough. This prevents the pigs from getting into the trough until the feed is ready for them.

FIG. 2.—FENDER FOR TROUGH.

For Fig. 2 attach the wide board as before, except that it should be two or three inches narrower than the trough, and should be hinged to the posts down close to the trough. Put on the side of this board, which extends into the pig yard, at the middle, hinge a notched board, as shown. These notches are to catch on one of the boards of the fence, to hold the feeder up while the hogs are eating. When let down it keeps them out.

Facts Farmers Ought to Know.

REV. MYRON REED,

THE MAN WHO MAY FILL HENRY WARD BEECHER'S PULPIT.

Some of His Characteristics—What He Looks Like—Fond of Fishing and Politics—An Enthusiastic American—Original, Forceful and Epigrammatic.

[Special Correspondence.]

NEW YORK, Oct. 15.—It is not impossible that Rev. Myron Reed, of Denver, will be Henry Ward Beecher's successor. At least he is prominently mentioned as one the congregation would be pleased with. Mr. Reed has opinions and is not at all afraid to express them. Without the least bunting around as a reformer, the front rank of thought will always contain him. In style he is unlike Mr. Beecher. His eloquence is of a different character. He has the power of convincing others, wooing them from their own beliefs to his, but it is not of the flowery order of Beecher's eloquence. He is epigrammatical—a condenser whose short, choppy sentences, like Emerson's, are each a separate pearl, strung together at random, yet making a strong and perfect chain.

Mr. Reed labored in Milwaukee, whence he went to Indianapolis and took charge of the First Presbyterian church, and was there five years. Finding climate enough it was to call him to Brooklyn, where his pastorate had a world wide influence. From Indianapolis Mr. Reed was called to Denver, where he is as much loved as he was in Indianapolis and elsewhere. He is nearly 50 now, but is strong and full of force. A grave looking man, and with a face for serious thinking, he has a strong sense of the humorous and is witty to a degree. His wit, however, is not bubbling and mirthful, as was Beecher's. It is incisive and lasting. It filters through his conversations and his sermons through his manner and his voice. Some of his jokes come forth—slow, drawling and unexpected. In truth, Mr. Reed looks a little like Mark Twain, and his method of delivery is much the same. It is said with a due sense of the difference in these that marks these two. He carries with him no pulpit atmosphere. Even in the pulpit he assumes no air of the preacher titled a few steps above his hearers. He is always one of them. He goes down to the edge of the platform on which the pulpit is built and talks to them from the same ground they are on as nearly as he can.

There is a story about Reed which illustrates his willingness to the regulation clergyman, and it is true, too. Like Nimrod, he is a mighty hunter before the Lord; also, famous for investing fish into nets and on hooks. When he takes his rod and goes off into the mountains or away up to where Canadian trout are plenty and camps out with a few chums or with strangers whose trail he happens to cross, he becomes another man. A particularly cheery party which contained Joe Murphy, the actor, for a season became one of them, and was known to them only as a fellow sportsman. He proved to be a most companionable person, phenomenally lucky as to fish. Some day one and the party got ready as usual to go out for fishes and game—all should have refrained from telling that very unpleasant story."

"Why, I be distressed," said Reed quietly, in his uninflected drawl. "When a gentleman tells a story of that kind I generally forget it; when a blackguard tells it I always do."

"Now, what did he mean by that?" said the story teller a little later to his most confidential friend.

In organizing works of charity Mr. Reed has had remarkable success. Both in Indianapolis and Denver his work in that capacity is a monument. He takes a warm interest in politics, and is a most enthusiastic American.

In a recent Fourth of July speech Mr. Reed told some of the things which constitute a man an American:

It was a good saying of a good bishop, new known and loved in Colorado, that he was—before American this and American that—an American; I chose to become one. You could not help yourself, I could."

The period of birthplace does not determine loyalty.

"I am not the believe that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," who believe that "resistance to tyrants is loyalty to God," are Americans.

Any man who says, "I will not have anything which another cannot have on equal terms," is an American.

State lines and sweeping waters do not divide men—it is separation of thought.

Place of birth decides little. I know native Americans who cannot trace any one as an equal.

I have seen native Americans who have a sneaking regret that Thomas Jefferson did not die before signing the Declaration of Independence, and who would dearly like to see that city that Hat Mr.

With Anglomania or any other folly which puts Americans to blushes, I have no patience. And he himself is a man whose life shows that an American may be in what he may be, is the most splendid of God's creations. G. G.

A Woman's Discovery.

"Another wonderful discovery has been made and that too by a lady in Philadelphia. Her health failing for years she suffered greatly from a cough and was advised to try Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, and was cured in two days. She says she had slept all night, and without a cough when she arose to dress herself. This was W. L. Hamrick & Co., of Shelby, N. C. Get a free trial bottle at Crouter's drug store.

The Verdict Unanimous.

W. D. Salt, druggist, Rome, Ga., writes: I can recommend Electric Bitters, as the very best remedy. Every bottle sold has given perfect satisfaction in every case. One man took six bottles and was cured of rheumatism of 10 years standing. Abundant testimony like this cannot lie. Sold by druggists at 50 cents per bottle.

The Keys. The kidneys and liver are the keys to a woman's health. If these organs are in a healthy condition no fear need be entertained of her health. The human system will cleanse itself of impure matter. If you have headache, dizzin ess, loss of appetite, lame back or side, failing strength, languor, excessive flow of urine, remember they are the signals of danger, and give warning to more serious trouble, such as, diabetes, bright's disease, etc. Dr. Mile's Specific for Diabetes, Kidney and Liver Cure is a sure cure for all these diseases. Price only $1 large bottle. Sold by Dr. Crouter.

Don't

Let that cold of yours run on. You think it is a trifling thing but it may run into bronchitis or into pneumonia. Or consumption. Catarrh is disgusting. Pneumonia is dangerous. Consumption is death itself.

The breathing apparatus must be kept healthy and clear of all obstructions and offensive matter. Otherwise there is trouble ahead.

All the diseases of lower parts, head, nose, throat, bronchial tubes and lungs, can be delightfully and certainly cured by the use of Shiloh's German Syrup. If you don't know this positively, thousands and thousands of people can tell you. They have been cured by it, and they know how it is, themselves." Bottle only 50 cents. Ask any druggist.

Always Useful. If you have rheumatism, neuralgia or any sprains stiff corks, sore muscles, bruises, sore throat, &c., Parmelee's Universal Liniment will cure quickly and surely. If your horse has a bone spavin, sweeny, sprain, bruise or lameness of any kind, Parmelee's Universal Liniment is the best possible remedy he can use. I have tried it, and never talked religion, nor had the celebrated preacher ever conducted himself in any manner than that of a gentlemanly comrade.

It is this good fellowship with all the world that makes Mr. Reed so much loved by people quite outside of his church and outside of any church. Without in the least seeking popularity he wins their friendship.

Clerical visits are not to his taste. He makes but few. The ordinary doings of society are somewhat of a bore to him; but he likes to drop into editorial sanctums, offices and workshops and chat in a chummy way. And everybody likes to have him drop in.

There is another story about Reed's unclerical appearance, also true. When new to Indianapolis he was one of a party of gentlemen in a down town office, when a man of cadaverous and forbidding aspect silly dirty mind, entered. He was brimful of a new and particularly unsavory joke and at once, without noticing the tall, grave, unpretentious looking stranger, began to work it off on the group, expecting roars of laughter as his reward. He somehow, as he proceeded to the consciousness of his listeners grew serious to painfulness. Their facial muscles contracted instead of relaxing, and hardened men of the world as they mostly were, here and there one blushed. The yarn was finished, and still nobody laughed. The teller looked about bewildered. This thing was not common. Somebody seized him by the arm, led him up to the grave looking stranger and said: "Mr. ——, let me present you to Rev. Myron Reed, the new pastor at the First Presbyterian church."

"Well, really," said the abashed filth peddler, "you must excuse me, Mr. Reed! I had no idea that a gentleman of your cloth was present or I most certainly should have refrained from telling that very unpleasant story."

"Don't be distressed," said Reed quietly, in his uninflected drawl. "When a gentleman tells a story of that kind I generally forget it; when a blackguard tells it I always do."

"Now, what did he mean by that?" said the story teller a little later to his most confidential friend.

In organizing works of charity Mr. Reed has had remarkable success. Both in Indianapolis and Denver his work in that capacity is a monument. He takes a warm interest in politics, and is a most enthusiastic American.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP.

Notes and News from the National Capital.

WHAT a queer place this old-new Washington is anyway, with its mixture of dingy buildings and modern palaces, links between the past and the present. But the old buildings cause no unpleasant emotions—rather suggesting trains of pleasant memories. They recall the Washington that Charles Dickens described in 1842, with its "spacious avenues that begin in nothing and lead nowhere, streets mile-long that only want houses, roads and inhabitants," and the Washington of which Tom Moore wrote at the beginning of the century:—

"This embryo Capital, where fancy sees Squares in messes, columns in trees."

LOOKING over the same ground we now see, as a picturesque writer describes it: "A wide, red city, washed in sunshine, standing out of the depths of a brittle, sapphire sky; its large contours bounded as with a silver unended scarf by the placid Potomac, domes and spires and noble buildings rising in quiet skies; the dome of the great Capitol swelling like a marble balloon on one far hill; architectural views fine enough for even a business streets thronged with people, busy human shuttle of statesmen and politicians, claimants, adventurers, poets and writers. These are the temptations for the lookeron and the invitation card Washington sends out to the world."

THERE is some talk of the destruction of another historic landmark in Washington. It is a small, old-fashioned brick house on Pennsylvania avenue, near the Treasury Department, which was once occupied by the office of the Treasurer of the United States. The government was not much troubled with a surplus in those days, and the funds on hand were kept in a little vault which was opened with a big key. This key the Treasurer kept in his own possession. In conversation with the chief signal officer a few days ago, I broached the subject of homing pigeons for the signal corps. He said he had embodied a recommendation in his annual report, arguing that experiments be made with these winged messengers during the the coming years especially from Key West toward Cuba with the expectation, based upon the opinion of experts, that by training these birds in flights from several United States' squadron in the vicinity of Havana might be enabled to return rapidly and certainly with the station at Key West. If such flight is possible from Cuba, it could be eventually extended to the Windward Islands and even to Venezuela.

On Sunday the congregation of Foundry Methodist Episcopal church celebrated the seventy-second anniversary of the dedicating of that edifice. The first structure was erected in 1815. The lot was given and the greater portion of the expense of building was paid for by George Fosall, of Georgetown. The liberality was in the nature of a thank offering for the protection vouchsafed by providence to the donor, who could and operated a large foundry. He cast a number of guns for the use of his fellow countrymen in the war of 1812 and when the British forces invaded this city and burned the capitol, Mr. Fosall rightly expected that his foundry would be destroyed. His fears, however, were not realized, and when the "piping times of peace" came back he expressed his gratitude by spending a considerable sum of money on the very modest place of worship which was put up on the corner of Fourteenth and G streets. There were two reasons for christening it "Foundry"; one was suggested by Mr. Fosall's business and its escape, and the other by the fact that John Wesley's famous meeting house in London had originally been a foundry, and when the church was organized by him he still retained its old appellation. In 1845 the congregation was too large for the building, so the structure was remodeled in that year and its outward appearance was somewhat improved. Here the members worshiped until 1864, and then it was decided to erect a new church, the present fine building being the result.

Some of the newspaper gossips report that at the president's levees in the west, places in the line of citizens who have turned out to shake his hand, comes 1 a good premium. This is a waste of money. By spending a trifle more these purchasers of places might pay the expenses of a trip to Washington during the season, where they would find excellent hotel accommodations, polite and well instructed guides, a city full of the most interesting sights, a chance to study, at close range, the workings of the government, for whose support they are taxed, and the behavior of the law makers they have sent here to represent them, and, at the proper time, the privilege of shaking the hand of the president without the disagreeable incidents of a crush, but in the serene atmosphere of his own official home. Such a visit would be infinitely more satisfactory than a great rough-and-tumble reception, at which a ten hours undertaking is crowded into sixty minutes. It would vastly expand their ideas of the dimensions of the Union, and the necessary complication of its government, and make them more charitable with the occasional mistakes of public servants, who want to do right, but cannot always see clearly in which direction duty leads. Last but not least they would feel a thrill of pride when they saw the beauty of the capital city of the nation—their own property as truly as that of the people who live in it—and they would feel willing to have their representatives in congress vote liberal appropriations for its upbuilding and improvement in every reasonable way.

Henry H. Smith, the journal clerk of the House of Representatives, has presented to Secretary Fairchild, on behalf of the citizens of Charlevoix, Mich., a petition praying that a gold medal or some other testimonial be presented to Miss May Wakefield, of Charlevoix, for her bravery in saving the lives of children. The secretary of the treasury is authorized by law to grant medals as a reward for bravery in life saving, and the citizens of Charlevoix think that Miss Wakefield's heroism should be recognized.

Oppression Under the Tariff.

A gentleman who did important service to the republican party at the time of its origin, and who, was for several years one of its members of congress, writes to the Herald to say that the oppressed classes who have succeeded the slaves of the south in suffering injustice under our government are the farmers and the wage earners. They are oppressed by our high tariff. "They both," he continues, "sell at free trade prices, and both buy at protection prices. Neither are protected. The price of the farmer's products is fixed abroad, and anybody from other countries may come here to compete with the wage earners." This is the deliberate judgment of one of the early republican leaders, and it represents the opinion of Charles Sumner and Henry Wilson in this state at the time they stood as representatives of republican sentiment. It cannot be too often urged that protection was not only no part of republicanism as it was originally constituted, but was directly at war with the whole spirit of the movement, which was a movement for freedom. In this point, the testimony from men who were republicans when the party originally entered upon its mission is pertinent and valuable.—Boston Herald.

Take it Off the Necessaries.

The need of taking the tariff tax off the necessaries of life instead of from off whiskey and tobacco was happily put in an interview in Detroit—"Here's my cigar," broke in the congressman, as he flourished the remains of a dry smoke which he had half chewed up when I could—on a pinch—walk the streets of Detroit without a cigar in my mouth, but just imagine how I'd look going along Woodward avenue without my shirt on! I couldn't do that you know. The tax has got to come off necessities."—Kalamazoo Gazette.

The Lick Training School.

It is ten years since James Lick, the San Francisco millionaire, died, leaving the bulk of his large fortune for charitable and scientific purposes, yet the more practical of his bequests—the training school in the trades for young lads—had never been begun. In October ten years of management the Lick trustees spent $150,000 for legal fees.

In Ireland 940,000 people speak the Celtic language, and 64,000 of that number speak no other.

Reduce the Tariff Taxes.

It is gratifying to note that there are some New York bankers who seem to understand the situation, and who instead of joining in the general cry for treasury relief, recognize the true state of the case. Attention is called in one Wall street dispatch to the fact that "the purchase of the entire $14,000,000 within the time set will only result in paying out of the treasury what tariff collections will scoop in—or less even than those tariff collections will amount to." The president of the New York Produce Exchange, Mr. Orr, says:

The bottom of the whole trouble is that the government revenue is too large for all legitimate expenditures, and money needed for ordinary circulation is tied up. Congress and not the secretary is the only power to give permanent relief. There were other collections in Wall street and out, that ran in much the same vein. The secretary might lay buttons temporarily, but permanent relief must be given by congress.

This sensible suggestion should concerned itself especially to the members of congress from the west. There is not one of them all whose constituents are not interested, and, except perhaps a small segment, in the general conspiracy to rob the public. The people whom they represent, instead of being benefited by the spoils of monopolistic tariff are consumers of manufactured articles. The western farmer has nothing to gain and a great deal to lose by protectionist duties. He sells his wheat, pork, beef, corn and other marketable products at prices not protected and made more profitable to him by any tariff. Practically there is a free trade in farm products and war duties on farm consumptions. A more one sided arrangement could hardly be conceived. Take for example wool and woolens. The sheep raisers are urged to insist on keeping up the old tariff rates by the assurance that if the fence is let down all the wool duties will be removed. They are advised to submit to the duties and all other duties rather than suffer a cut in wool. Does the present price of this article justify the claim that the tariff insures a good market for fleeces? On the contrary, those sheepy farmers are finding out by experience that the wool tariff is a delusion and a snare. Statistics show, too, that the division of the spoils is peculiarly unfair. Last year the tariff receipts from the duties on wool amounted to $8,126,108, while those on woolens foot up $27,278,827. In other words, the manufacturers put nearly six dollars into the farmer one dollar. Nor is that either all or the worst. Besides imposing a tax of this magnitude on the country for imported woolens, there is some bounty tax on domestic woolen goods through the enhanced cost of the same to consumers. The average rate of duty on imported woolens is nearly 100 per cent. ad valorem. And as the consumption of domestic woolens is not less than 400 millions per annum, these goods, without the war tariff of 1867, would have only worth 200 millions, the loss to the consumers being 165 millions. The 40 millions' worth of imported woolen goods, with the 27 millions of war tariff added, cost the consumers 68 millions, without counting the middlemen's profits, charged on the duties as well as on the foreign value. Thus it appears that in order to procure 27 millions of unnecessary revenue on imported woolens there is added about 200 millions a year to the cost of the woolen clothing of the American people. And this is called "protection." And for whose benefit? The beggarly five millions which are supposed to go to the farmers (not one in ten of whom owns a sheep) do not offset one per cent. of this enormous tax on the consumers. The laboringmen everywhere are improving every opportunity to disclaim any responsibility for continuing the war tariff. The trade unions, the labor conventions, and industrial gatherings of different sorts proclaim with emphasis the conviction that the imposition of high duties on the pretense of benefiting them is a fraud. Again we ask our western congressmen to go to Washington this winter, many of them for the first time, determined to afford their constituents relief from the outrageous tariff extortion which is blaspheming the farms of the west, with mortgages, as well as filling the treasury of the United States with a surplus which is deranging the money market to the verge of a panic.—Chicago Tribune.

A STARTLING DEATH.

The President Welcomed to Memphis by Judge H. T. Elliett—The Latter Almost Immediately Expires from Paralysis of the Heart.

MEMPHIS was beautifully decorated in honor of the President's visit, and there were more people in the streets of the town than were ever seen before. After a formal speech of welcome delivered by Judge H. T. Elliott and responded to by the President, a public reception was held at the Cotton Exchange. A distressing event happened just after the President left the stand where the speeches were made. Judge Elliott, who had stood for some time with his hat off and with his head exposed to the sun, was overcome by the heat, and expired within five minutes. The people began to move away, and the Presidential party left the square for the Exchange Hall long. There Mr. and Mrs. Cleveland received the greetings of thousands, and when the reception was over left for Nashville. The President and Mrs. Cleveland, with their traveling companions, spent Sunday at Bell Meade farm, six miles from Nashville. This is one of the most magnificent estates in the South, and is the home of General W. P. Jackson, a brother of Judge Jackson, who was formerly United States Senator.

NEXT to Mt. St. Elias in Alaska, Mt Tacoma is the loftiest peak in the United States. Its ascent is very difficult, and the scenery is extremely wild. An illustrated account of a climb to the highest attainable point will be given by C. D. Hendrickson in the November American Magazine.

THE remedy, and the only one, for industrial discontent, is the removal of everything that in any way interferes with the free operation of the competitive principle, and to that end all Americans, whether rich or poor, hand laborers or capilalists, have need to work together.—New York Comercial Advertiser.

THE democratic administration is redeeming democratic pledges. The people's hand is being rescued from the hungry maw of monopolists and held in secured trust for the homeless. The giant corporations that controlled the servants of the people during republican rule are no longer in a position to bleed the people by corrupting their servants.—Pittsburgh Post.

ANARCHY is feared in Morocco. That is a very excellent country in which to try the anarchial experiment and if Most, Hinton, George and all others who are not condemned to hang should go to Africa to experiment with their principles we have an idea that they would get a free passage. —New York Mail and Express.

EVERY well informed man knows that any average rate of taxation upon imported goods which would enable the government to realize the amount of revenue it would be compelled to raise from that source would more than compensate for the difference between the cost of labor here, and in other manufacturing countries."—Speaker Carlisle.

THE country is so large and full of resources, land is so cheap and abundant, and the American people are so ingenious and enterprising that an unwise economic policy can only retard our progress; while the fact that we have free trade among sixty millions of people, the largest consumers in the world, extending through a great variety of climate and production, makes heavy taxation on imported goods endurable. To say that we are taxed into prosperity is quite another matter.—Boston Herald.

THE farmers of America are advised by tariff orators and editors "to keep their eyes on the home market." That is what they have been doing, and the more they look the more clearly they discover that nearly all those commodities which they are obliged to purchase are taxed at an average rate of about fifty per cent in the home market, while their wheat, rye and corn and other farm products are subject to the prices that rule in London and Liverpool in open competition with all the world.—Philadelphia Record.

THE Gladstone Delta thinks the time is ripe for the organization of the state of Superior out of the upper peninsula and a portion of northern Wisconsin. Not yet boys; wait a wee until grangerdom helps to provide us with a number of additional state institutions. We need an insane asylum and a public school yet.—St. Ignace Republican.

Don't remember saying that the time is ripe—only said things are getting mellow. If we wait until grangerdom help us out we'll be old and rheumatic. Look at the school of mines, which has not where to lay its head.—Delta.

THE 200,000,000 acres of public domain granted to railroad corporations were all voted away by acts of congress passed by the republicans. This policy was first initiated on July 1, 1865, and the amount of land donated first and last under Republican auspices is 500,000,000 acres. The purpose of the democratic administration has been to recover for the use of actual settlers, not the railroad lands properly taken up in conformity with law, but those upon which the monopolists have fastened, in disregard of the rights of the residents or of the necessity of leaving the unsettled portions open to the occupancy of those who desire to found homesteads upon them.—New York Star.

Michigan Crop Report.

The returns at Lansing this month indicate that the wheat product of Michigan the present year amounts to 22,815,153 bushels. The average yield per acre is 13 and 8-tenths bushels.

Probably no wheat crop ever grown in this state was more difficult to estimate than that of 1887. The yield varies so greatly in different localities, and on different farms in the same localities, that a report, however accurate, for even a large area, furnishes no certain basis for an estimate of the entire crop. The figures above given are based on the area in wheat as shown in the July crop report, the actual yield of 256,935 acres as shown by records kept by threshers, and the actual yield of 165,918 acres grown on 3,150 farms, as shown by a canvass made by correspondents.

Much of the area covered by the canvass made by correspondents is doubtless included in the returns taken from threshers' records. The acreage threshed, taken from the threshers' record includes about one-sixth of the total wheat acreage of the state.

The wheat product as above estimated is about 4,708,000 bushels less than the crop of 1886, and more than 5,000,000 less than the average annual product in the eight years, 1878-85.

The average yield per acre of wheat raised on corn stubble is returned at 11 and 34-hundredths bushels; on wheat stubble, at 11 and 29 hundredths bushels; on oat stubble, at 12 and 33-hundredths bushels; and on summer fallow, at 17 and 34-hundredths bushels.

The yield per acre of oats in the southern four tiers of counties is 30 and 36-hundredths bushels; in the central, 29 and 5-hundredths bushels; and in the northern counties 23 and 73-hundredths bushels.

Barley averages 21 and 16 hundredths bushels per acre in the state

Corn is estimated to yield 39 bushels of ears in the southern counties, 54 bushels of ears in the central counties, and 45 bushels of ears in the northern counties. These figures indicate an average for the state of about 20 bushels of shelled corn, or about two-thirds of an average crop.

Potatoes will yield not to exceed one-third of an average crop. The estimate, comparison being made with a full average, is 28 per cent in the southern counties, and 43 and 44 per cent in the central and northern sections, respectively.

Winter apples will yield about one-half of an average crop.

Object Lesson in Economy.

We now sport a nice milch cow. How did we get her? Bought her. Paid $40 for her, the whole amount being 10c per day, saved since March 6, 1886. On that day a friend of ours insisted on treating us to a smoke, as it was our birthday, but we refused the kindness, informing him, courteously that we never smoked a cigar, to which he replied that he averaged from one to three per day, at a cost of 5c to 20c each day, and that he never missed the small change. We told him then, that from that day on, we would lay away 10c per day as long as we were able to do so, and see how much it would amount to each year. We have kept it up to date, and as a consequence we have a fine Durham cow and calf bought with 400 10 cent pieces.—Bandera (Tex.) Bugle.

A Cure for Insomnia.

If you are troubled with insomnia these sultry nights just turn the faucet of cold water in your bath room for a minute or two upon your feet and then thoroughly dry them. Haul taut your mosquito bar, let your head lie low, and, like the pious country blacksmith in his pew at church, close your eyes and think of nothing. The cold water drives the blood to the head and produces a soporific effect. One of the big Portuguese onions sliced and neatly seasoned and eaten with thin bread, in the form of sandwiches, would be good. An ordinary United States onion will do if the great big fellows are out of the market. Onions are full of opium. Let business and all mental labor go out of your head. Keep the thoughts of maturing notes, interest upon mortgages, the good looking chap that was attentive to your best girl, and all such enemies to repose on the outside of your mosquito netting.—New York Times.

"It is curious," remarked a salesman in a Chestnut street store, "what old ladies will make for not buying things rather than tell the truth."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

Churchless London People.

London has a great problem. It has 2,600,000 people unable to get into a place of worship. In central London, with 2,000,000, there is only accommodation for 400,000.—Commercial Advertiser.

MICHIGAN MENTION.

Nelson Manson, the St. Ignace man who was shot by a neighbor who had been trying to stop Mr. Manson's devilitry, that we mentioned last week has died of his injuries. According to all accounts dying was about as decent a thing as Manson has done for a long time.

The state editor of the Evening Journal says, a Minnesota man has written to the clerk of Ann Arbor city, offering to sell the burg some tame deer for $75 per head. Declined with thanks, on the grounds that the beasts might bite the university students nights as they were going home from church.

The Mining Journal says; Lower Michigan wholesalers now get a good share of the upper peninsula trade. A few years ago they got but a very little, Chicago and Milwaukee taking the bulk of it. The change is due to the better railroad service, and also to the enterprise of the lower Michigan dealers. Not a day passes now but there are Saginaw, Grand Rapids, Detroit and other lower state traveling men in the city. They do not go away without taking a goodly grist of orders, either.

THE "DRY HIDE WORM."

An Insect Destroyer of Boots and Shoes—Professor Riley's Report.

In the last report of the commissioner of agriculture, Professor C. V. Riley states that the beetle known to science as Dermestes vulpinus, and in its larval state to tanners as the "dry hide worm," came under his observation in 1884, for the first time, as a destroyer of boots and shoes. The insect was first noticed in the establishment of a wholesale manufacturer in St. Louis in the spring of 1884, when a lot of boots and shoes which had been shipped to some Southern town were returned condemned as "wormy." This led to an examination of the stock in store, and the proprietor found, to his astonishment, that there was justice in the complaints of his customer, and that several boxes of heavy boots and shoes which had been packed for some time were literally swarming with the insect in all stages of development. This was the first time that he had ever known of the existence of such a pest.

About the same time the insects were found in numerous leather houses throughout the same city, and invaded the manufactories. In the summer of 1885 public attention was called to the pest by various oral and exaggerated accounts of the "grub" that worked unseen in the soles of shoes, reducing them to mere shells, which crushed into fragments when subjected to the pressure of the foot in wearing.

Another case of the destructive action of this same beetle was brought to Professor Riley's attention at about the same time by Mr. F. Eisenstein, of Savannah, Ga., whose firm had instituted a lawsuit against the steamship company, by reason of damages done by the insect to boots while in transit from Savannah to Boston.

In the St. Louis case, one of the dealers were able to trace the introduction of the insect from any particular warehouse or tannery, but learned from tanners that it was quite common in old hides.

In the warehouses and manufactories the insect still retained its partiality for undressed leathers, and an examination at once shows that the soles and heels of boots and shoes are more liable to injury than the uppers. It seems probable that the comparative immunity of the uppers is due to the oily dressing used in the finishing processes. They do not, however, entirely escape, for they are occasionally found bored by the larva or roughened or crooked by the beetle.

The work of the larvæ, both young and full grown, consists in boring smooth, round channels in every direction through the leather, preferring as above stated, the soles and heels. A favorite place for entering the shoe is in the angle between the sole and heel, or in the crevice between the upper and the sole, a crack of some kind seeming to be necessary to enable them to get sufficient purchase to begin boring.

The principal occupation of the adult beetle is the propagation of the species, yet it also is a leather destroyer, gnawing and scoring the surface of the boot or shoe, but not burrowing bodily into its substance.

Professor Riley states that when the insect has already made an entrance into cases of boots and shoes, it will not be a difficult matter to destroy it by a proper use of bisulphide of carbon. Of course, it would be preferable to overhaul the contents of each box thoroughly, and to treat the boots in which the insect is found with benzine or some other efficacious insecticide; but, where this cannot be done without too great expense, it will probably suffice to open each case and place an open saucer of the bisulphide on top of the contents. The liquid will volatilize, and the vapor will sink down through the mass, if the box be tight, and will kill the insects in their burrows.

As the natural home of the insect is in hides, it devolves upon transportation companies that carry both made up leather goods and hides to exercise some degree of care and cleanliness, as they are otherwise liable to lay themselves open to damages payable to the owners of the more expensive goods.—Scientific American.

The Early Americans.

The early Americans were representatives of the stone age in most cases, although a few possessed the knowledge of metals. They were particularly clever stone workers, and the samples of their workmanship show them well versed in the arts of the potter. In clay molding they were also skillful. The textile arts were practiced, such as cotton and wool spinning and weaving. Cotton was extensively raised in Mexico and Yucatan and two species of goats were acclimatized to Peru for the sake of their wool.—Boston Budget.

Letter from Dr. Crouter.

DENVER, Col., Oct. 18.

C. J. STRANG,—Sir; I promised so many friends to let them know how Mrs. Crouter stood her journey, that I think it best to tell you, knowing very well that an editor always (or nearly always) tells all he knows.

Our journey from Charlevoix to Chicago was a twenty-seven hours ride, where we were met by our friend Dr. E. A. West, and accompanied to their beautiful home on West Monroe street, where Mrs. Crouter found rest and comfort, while I was entertained by Ed and his friend Harry H. Clark of Mendota. We visited the West gas wells. Ed West's friends in Charlevoix will be glad to know that he has within a few days struck it rich—in a natural gas well.

Wednesday, Oct. 12th, after a rest of five days, we started westward by the great Burlington route, over which a person travels as comfortably as by any route in America. Five hundred miles west of Chicago we rest again, at Lincoln, Neb., the capital of the state, a town of 40,000 inhabitants. We were there only two days. I noticed when I went to buy peaches, the fruit man says: "Those are the best peaches that come into this city; they are Michigan peaches. And here are some fine Michigan apples." At this I introduced myself. "Why," he says, "those peaches came from your section, on Traverse Bay." I also found that we give better telephone service in Charlevoix than they do in Lincoln. Our streets and yards are also better kept.

Five hundred miles farther westward we reach this beautiful city of Denver. Our first day here Mrs. Crouter did not feel as well. To-day we drove for an hour, and viewed the Rockies,—historic Pike's Peak in the distance,—and came back very much refreshed.

Denver is not unlike Detroit in buildings, streets, etc. I felt to-day that I was from the best state in the union, when I saw Michigan apples bringing the highest price in the market,—$5.75 a barrel, shipped from Lansing. I visited the state fair today. The exhibit of fruit and vegetables could not be called better than Charlevoix county's exhibit at East Jordan.

Everything is sold by the pound here. You can buy a pound of apples, potatoes, cabbage, eggs, etc., but you cannot buy by peck, piece, or dozen. It seems to me this would be a good plan to adopt in Michigan.

After a few days rest we will move 800 miles further west, through the mountains, to Salt Lake City, where we will rest until the first of November, and where I expect to get news from home. Yours truly,

G. W. CROUTER.

Eveline.

INGOMAR Oct. 25.—William Henry, with his team left for the upper peninsula, one day last week. James Polly went with him.

School in Mountain district opened on Tuesday, the 18th, with Miss Bennett, of Eastport, as teacher.

The H. H. society met with Mrs. J. D. Parrish, last Wednesday evening, and a very enjoyable time was had. The program was as follows: A song by all; solo, by Miss Nellie Noyes; a paper, by J. M. Harris, on the history of Charlevoix county; a paper, by W. H. Jarman, on the organization of Eveline, and another song. The society adjourned, to meet with Miss Nellie Noyes, next Wednesday evening, November 2d, when another interesting program will be presented.

Mr. Mead Benson and family have moved into Mr. E. G. Jarman's house. Mr. B. is working for Mr. Peterson cutting wood.

Chas. Peterson has his camps completed and ready for winter business. And on one day last week the family of E. G. Jarman moved into the camp and will do the cooking.

Mr. Peterson expects to employ a force of twenty men cutting wood. He will get out 2,000 cords.

Dr. Winslow, of Petoskey, was in town last week, three days on a hunting expedition. While here he stopped with his brother-in-law, W. A. Stanley, at the Peterson camp.

Nearly everyone has finished digging their potatoes and pulling their bagas.

Ellsworth.

ELLSWORTH, Oct., 25, 1887—Winter. Has it come to stay?

Very few of the farmers have all of their crops taken care of yet.

Mrs. Alex Crego rode into town in a sleigh, and pronounced it good sleighing.

We are waiting anxiously for railroad news.

Would it not be a good plan for Charlevoix county to have their county buildings rebuilt in some town where they have good fire protection.

Burgess.

BURGESS, Oct 26.—Who says winter has not begun?

Mrs. Whitford has been visiting at her sister, Mrs. Hamlin's the past week.

Several members in the family of Oscar Tillotsons are sick with scarlet fever and every precaution should be used to prevent its spreading.

Mr. and Mrs. Arnold took advantage of the excursion, and have gone to Eaton county on a visit.

Shipments

The following are the shipments from the port of Charlevoix, reported for the week ending Wednesday evening:

Oct. 20—Schr. Sea Gem, 75 cords slabs, Cram and Whitford, to Milwaukee.
20—Schr. Hattie Fisher, 75 cords bark, 12 cords wood, A. F. Draper & Co., to Milwaukee.
20—Schr. Mocking Bird, 100,000 feet hemlock lumber, Jo'ia Nichols, to Chicago.
20—Schr. Lenzena, 18 cords wood, C. S. McCausland to Sheboygan.
22—Schr. Dan Maher, 150 cords wood, Geo. Burnham & Sons to Milwaukee.
25—Prop. W. F. Thew, 300 tons pig iron, Pine Lake Iron Co. to Cleveland.

☞Sensible Girl—"Say, Pa, won't you please let me have the money to buy my winter dress?"

Fond Father—"Too soon yet, my child."

S. G.—"Not a bit. I want to get the first choice, and A. T. Washburne & Co. have marked their goods down to rock bottom already."

F. F.—Get what you want and send the bill to me. I know you will be safe if you trade there."

Restored by Magic.—Has the lake air and wind spoiled your complexion? Do you long for a preparation that will completely remove the moth, tan and pimples, and leave the skin clear and soft? If so you have but to buy a bottle of Hamilton's Oriental Balm which is simply magical in the effect and perfectly harmless. It is put in all the best families and gives unbounded satisfaction. P. ice 50 cents per bottle. Sold by G. W. Crouter.

No Scrofula can be so deep-seated or malignant and stubborn that Parmelee's Blood Purifier will not be found helpful. It will effect a cure if cure be possible, and if you are troubled with Boils, Salt Rheum, Pimples, Rough Skin, or any humor whatever, just give the Purifier a thorough trial and you cannot fail to receive benefit from it. Price $1 per bottle. Sold by Dr. G. W. Crouter.

Look at the date on the yellow address label on this paper, and see if you owe the printer. If you do, come and see us. If the slip does not show a credit the week following payment, please notify us at once, that the omission may be corrected.

Watch Dogs for Sentry Duty.

One of the latest freaks of military science is the training of watch dogs for sentry duty. The French war minister has given orders that dogs shall be tried in connection with advance post duty and taught to bark at the approach of an enemy or stranger. Dogs are also to be muzzled as scouts, and if they prove useful they are to be attached to all the line regiments and stationed regularly with the double sentries. "Letting loose the dogs of war" thus promises to have a literal as well as a metaphorical meaning.—New York Tribune.

Turner's Sloppy Manner.

Turner's abruptness of speech is still remembered in Fawley. A genuine love of art runs through the Fawkes family, and one of the daughters, anxious for his criticism, ventured one day timidly to lay before him a water color drawing of her own. His only comment was, "Put in a jug of water." Her monosyllabic chagrin was great, but on turning the advice over in her mind she became persuaded that in that one pregnant sentence Turner had revealed one of his secrets. He certainly worked in what may be called a "sloppy" manner.

Only once did he relax his usual secretiveness, and let Mr. Fawkes see him at work. At breakfast one morning the conversation turned upon war ships, and Mr. Fawkes handing a small bit of paper to Turner, said: "Show me the size of a man of war on that." The idea tickled Turner. He took his best to his room, and in his presence and before the end of the morning produced the highly finished, marvelous water color now hanging in the saloon at Farsley, called "The First Rate taking in Stores." The same ship is repeated three times at different angles and different distances, with every detail accurate and clear. It was a wonderful feat of memory and of speed, but the method of working was no less remarkable. The paper was soaked, blistered, dashed, rubbed, scratched with the thumb nail (kept hideously long for the purpose), until at length beaten and colour broke from chase.—Magazine of Art.

Criticism of Wagner.

"Mamma," was the criticism of a very young gentleman at a rendering of Wagner music during a Philharmonic concert, "it sounds just as if they were tearing cotton cloth!"—The Epoch.

MISS SUSIE.

BY C. E. RAYMOND.

Dropping her plaited gaiter,
With the sweet smile on her face,
Talking to that ragged urchin
Standing in the market-place?

Well, she has done more good now
In this wicked world of ours,
Than the teachers, and the preachers,
And all others, I'll be bound.

Why, sir, she's a very angel!
Her wings are only hidden in parts.
What's her business? Let its pen, now—
Healing crushed and broken hearts.

Have a cigar, sir? You don't use it?
I'm no doubt but that you're right.
I've spent many a dollar on it,
Even when my purse was light.

That's the curse of all bad habits
First thing you know you're a slave.
Strange, a man should be so foolish
As to bring dig his own grave!

Yes, but what about the story?
There, it slipped my memory quite.
A strange story! but I trust, sir,
God knows always what is right.

She was just the sweetest lassie
To be seen in all the town;
Rosy cheeks, and sunny ringlets,
And large laughing eyes of brown.

Every one loved dear Miss Susie,
But young Allen most of all;
They, so long affianced lovers,
Could be wedded in the fall.

Swiftly upon the golden summer,
Came the gentle autumn days,—
Golden rod and scarlet maple,
Hills all veiled in purple haze.

Just the night before the wedding
Allen met a shabby tramp,
Would he not for "auld lang syne" sake,
But you know where these things tend.

How it happened no one knew, sir,
But they found poor Allen dead;
Flesh all torn and lacerated,
And a deep gash in his head.

When they told her the sad news, sir,
Oh, it was a fearful sight!
Roses on morning golden ringlets
All were changed to snowy white.

For a time they feared her reason
Would be shaken from its throne,
But at last you see she came back,
Made her trusting heart its own.

Then she went out in the world, sir,
Breathing hope and joy, and love;
Till the listening angels heard her,
Watching from their home above.

MADISON, WIS.

HOW ONE SOLDIER OBEYED ORDERS.

Twenty-two years ago, if you followed the pike out of Winchester, Virginia, going south, you would see on the left-hand side of the road, about sixty rods from the town, a small twostory frame house, standing near the pike, in a barren yard. That house was the scene of a military tragedy such as did not often occur in the armies, and which illustrated in the most striking manner the fidelity of a young recruit to duty, and to the strict military maxim—"obey orders." Let me tell the story.

It will be best to say at the start that the real names of the principal actors in this episode are suppressed. They are fresh in mind, and could easily be traced; but when the account has been read the reasons for withholding them will be perfectly understood. The hero of the adventure was at the time a lad of less than twenty years, a recruit of the Fifteenth Maine Infantry, and had been but six weeks in the service. His share in the events of that night was not only honorable but highly praiseworthy; yet as he may now be, if surviving, the father of a family, possibly a man of wealth and prominence at home, I should not wish, without his consent, to attach his true name to the sketch. We will therefore call him Private Brigham. As for the unhappy victim of the encounter, whose rashness, or worse, led him on to his death, charity to his memory and to the feelings of surviving relatives appeals to me to withhold his name. He will be styled Lieutenant Y——.

The time was April, 1865; it was a few days after the news had reached us of the surrender at Appomattox. I was Judge Advocate of Dwight's Division, which was thrown out about two miles in front of Winchester. Early one morning the field Officer of the Day came riding in to headquarters to report. I stood by and heard what he said to the Adjutant General.

"everything's all right in the picket line; but I hear of a row that occurred at a house where we have a sergeant, on the pike, back near town. There was a man killed—some say an officer.

I was immediately dispatched to investigate. As I rode up to the house I saw a group of idlers in front. One of them said something about "kilt." Dismounting, I stopped long enough outside to see what they were looking at. Sure enough, it was blood; drops of it on the steps and on the ground.

I went in. Two or three women were in the hall, pale as ghosts, and almost hysterical. They began to talk at once, but I stopped them. I told them who I was, my errand, and that they must tell me the exact truth as to what had happened.

I got their story and then went into the back room. There was Private Brigham, a slender slip of a fellow, about as pale as the women, but looking just like a soldier as he grasped his gun (a springfield musket with the bayonet fixed.

I had learned enough already to satisfy me where the truth lay, and I talked kindly and securingly to the young soldier while I took notes of his statement.

"Give it to me just as it happened," I said. "If you have obeyed orders and done your duty, no harm shall come to you."

He told me his story, which perfectly matched that of the women, in a simple and straightforward way. These people and straightforward way. These accounts, I have never doubted, gave the whole truth of the affair.

Before going back to headquarters I went into another room, where something on the floor was covered by a white sheet from a bed. One of the women turned it down. A dead man lay there with a bayonet wound clear through his breast. There were no straps upon the shoulders of his blouse, but I recognized the face at once. It was that of Lieutenant Y——, of the cavalry, whom I had met in Winchester the winter before. He was a wild fellow, much given to drinking and gaiety, but of handsome face and fine address.

And this was how it happened:

The occupants of the house were a widow and her two grown daughters. They had been annoyed by depredations of some soldiers, to which had been lately added an occasional visit by Lieutenant Y——. He was, or professed to be, in love with one of the girls. Both she and her mother had requested him not to trouble them, fearing that he would not heed the request, they had asked for a safeguard, which had been furnished the night before in the person of Private Brigham.

To "force a safeguard," in military parlance, is a grave crime. The officer or soldier who would do it would lay himself liable to no less penalty than that of death! The safeguard stands for the protection of peaceable citizens and their property, and has the power of the whole army at its back.

It is doubtful whether Private Brigham, fresh in the service as he was, fully realized that; but he knew what his orders were, and he was determined to obey them. They were to admit no one to the house but an officer on duty.

Some time after dark three horsemen rode up to the door and dismounted. One of them, Lieutenant Y——, opened the door, and was confronted with a bayonet at the end of a musket, in the hands of the resolute safeguard. One of the women held a lamp back in the hall.

What happened did not take two minutes. The officer swore at Brigham, and ordered him to stand back. The soldier told him flatly that he could not enter, and that he would hurt if he tried it. The officer swore again, was taunted by his companions outside for being kept back by "an infantry toad-stabber," and he made a rush. The soldier put the bayonet straight through him. He must have died instantly; his heart was cloven through. He tumbled to the floor, and the women ran back again on guard. Private Brigham stood again on guard. There was more profanity outside, and another man appeared on the steps and attempted to enter. He, too, was warned, but pressed on, and promptly received the bayonet through his arm. He waited for no more, but beat a hasty retreat, was helped on his horse by the orderly, and rode away.

On the report that I made to General Dwight of this affair, I was ordered to defend the soldier whenever he should be brought before a court-martial. I expected to have to do this, and made ready to do it; but the occasion never came. Brigham was never tried, and honorably finished his service. I never knew exactly why no greater stir was made about the matter, but the reasons are not hard to conjecture. The cavalry division in and about Winchester was commanded by General Torbert, the same who lost his life by drowning, a few years since, off the coast of Florida. I have no doubt that he made his own investigation, and became satisfied that the safeguard did exactly the correct thing, and that a court-martial would be a useless form when the facts were so well known. Nothing but reproach to the dead man and his companion could have come from the trial of Private Brigham; so the whole business was wisely dropped.

But I doubt if another instance of such promptness and fidelity to orders can be found in a laid not two months in the army. It is such stuff makes heroes!

EXCESSIVELY HONEST.

BY OTIS E. BEAD.

Very few negro preachers have abundant the polish on account of the varities of recent religion or the discomforting reflections which have been imputed to the cloth. Among the very—we may say solitary—few may be reckoned old Uncle Marcus. Mischief-breeders—and they are to be found in nearly every congregation—declared that old Gus gave up the calling which he had so long pursued because his people failed to pay him adequately, but those who had most larger partakers of the old man's rigid casuistry knew that he could no longer associate with co-workers who, while on their way to prayer-meeting, marked with calculating eye the horse of the chicken-coop, and who heard, with the keen ear of interest, the rustling of a generous pobbie.

Gus moved to town, rented a small shanty, and opened a vegetable store. He hung up a motto, which, with almost pardonable pleonasm, declared: "Honest as honest dar ain't no man dat deserves ter prosper," and was explaining it to several members of his former flock when a white man entered, and, after looking around a few moments, said:

"By the way, I left my umbrella in here the morning. It's lying over yonder. Hand it to me, please."

Gus stared at him.

"I say, hand it to me, please."

"I look yere, mister, I doan know yo name but I'se gwine ter be verbile wid yer; so, yes' lemme tell yer ter go on erbout yer business erfairs an doan' come 'round yere projekin' wid me. Wen I'se got erfairs ter 'ten' ter."

"I tell you that I left that umbrella here, and I want it.

"Oh, I knows mighty well wut yer tells me. De closest 'quintances I ever had ain' 'cused me o' bein deaf. Oh, yas, I knows wut yer says."

"If you don't give me that umbrella I'll get after an officer."

"Dat's one o' de rights o' de Merican citizenship, ash, set down by the constitution an' 'fended by de Preserdent; but dar ain' no clause in de lawwhipe ter make or pressus gin up de property dat ho's dun 'cumerlated. I'se had dat brella er long time, ash, longer den yerself has been able ter 'dorse yer verse' at de banks in dis town. Bought dis 'brella wid some mighty hard-'arned money. Go on, mister; go on, for I'se in er 'scussion wid sum o' mer friends."

The man hurriedly withdrew. Old Gus continued: "Dat's de way it is. Dat wite man, if he had been totch up right, wort er been er honest passon. Yer see, it is, he gwine 'roun' de neighborhood 'tryin' ter cheat folks outen dar rights. I tell yer, dis yere worl is gwine ter rack mighty fas'; an de preachers 'stand o' tryin' ter stop it, year to be smilin' on de 'formance."

The claimant of the umbrella, accompanied by an officer, entered the store.

"Old man," said the officer, "this gentleman claims that umbrella."

"Yas, sah, yas; an' he mout claim do moon, but dat doan mean dat he gwine git it. It's my brella, sah; bought an' 'faired for. I ken go an' show yer war I bought it—show yer de very place."

"How long have you had it?"

"Hout two years."

"And have kept it well."

"I has, sah. I allus takes kere o' de property dat de Lawd lets me 'cumerlate."

"My name is R. D. Lane," said the claimant. "Hand the umbrella here a moment."

Old Gus began to argue, but the officer seized the umbrella and handed it to the claimant, who, moving a silver dime, disclosed its owner.

"Old man," said the officer, "that is sufficient. It is clear that you are a sagacious."

"Git outen dis house, bof o' yer! Git out. Wen er man comes slippin' 'roun' yere writin' his name on an' property wen I ain't lookin', wy, I ain' got no use fur him. I tell yer wut, turning to his friends, "I'll bet he kin jump de yere house tighter. Dat trifin' white passon will slip in an' write his name on all dese yere cabbages an' cowcumbers. I reckon of he wuz ter walk his hoss ter de door wen I is asleep he'd take me erway, too. Oh, my dyin' sinner friends, we all hafter be mighty keerful. It pains me ter say so, but it is er plum' flat-footed fact. Wall, of ever body wuz liars, I doan reckon half de folks would know wut ter do wid dar great' gifts. But it is sot ter thing, sah. Brudder John; powerful sad."—Arkansaw Traveler.

Humorous Mistakes.

Schoolmasters, in their daily routine of instruction, receive many curious answers to the plainest questions. Boys who are supposed to be at a certain amount of originality, as well as those whose wits are somewhat less sharpened by the grindstone, often afford a hearty laugh from a careless blunder or thoughtless reply. A schoolmaster, in vain that the teacher strives to keep countenance and look severe at a ludicrous exposure of ignorance. Especially in Scripture history do these ludicrous mistakes occur, and any one who has read the answers to examination papers on this subject will have come across many instances.

The correction of the Scripture papers of a school to which I had been appointed assistant examiner once fell to my lot. One of the questions asked was:

"Who was John the Baptist, and what was his mission?"

Among other extraordinary answers, I found this:

"He was a stone-breaker, and had to mend the roads so that they should be good when Jesus went that way."

Another wrote his reply to the question:

"Who was Matthew?"

"He was a man who kept a public house.

For an account of the resurrection, one boy said:

"Lazarus was in a cave, and his head was wrapt up in a napkin, and he tried to climb a high tree, but could not, because he was a small statue. And when the cock crew he went out and wept bitterly."

The ideas of this young gentleman were evidently rather confused.

One day, in a geography lesson, I was wishing to get at the name of Dagon, the god of the Philistines. I asked, "Boys, I want a little fellow, and he wanted a lift, so I said, suggestively:

"Well, who killed the giant Goliath?"

For a moment there was a puzzled look on his face, and then, with a sudden inspiration, he exclaimed:

"Oh, I know—Tom Thumb!"

No doubt that story had later stored with fairy lore than holy writ, and he had confused the story of the little Tom Thumb with that of Jack the Giant Killer.

During the same lesson a helping hand was needed to get at the name St. Bede's Head. I inquired:

"What do you call those insects that fly about in summer and make honey?"

"Oh, please, sir, please!" replied the youngster, heading only the first part of the question.

On another occasion, when endeavoring to explain the meaning of the term "religious bigot," I had so far as to call it "passing happiness," when a small boy hard forth with:

"Oh, sir, a kiss."

Evidently he knew too well that kisses soon are past, and while they last are sweet, and with the happy example at his tongue's end, could not contain himself, but had to let the idea have its own way and come out.—London Exchange.

LEISURE HOURS states that in Germany the blacksmith, when finishing a horseshoe, punches a hole in the two ends, and when the shoe is cold he taps in a screw thread and screws into the shoe, when on the horse's foot, a sharp-pointed stud of an inch in length, and with shoes thus fitted the horse travels securely over the worst possible road; either when rising or driving hailstones are also used in the same way. When the horse comes to the stable the groom unscrews the pointed stud and screws in a button, so that no damage can happen to the horse, and the screw holes are prevented from filling. When the horse is going out the groom takes out the button and screws in the pointed stud, and there is no fear of the horse coming down on his knees or strained sinews, and the public are spared the sight of horses down or slipping in all directions.

Screws that are too small for separate treatment may be cleaned from rust as follows: Take a pound of screws and place them in a small box—a cigar box will do; put a small quantity of oil on them and shake for a minute; then put a piece of cotton waste in the box and repeat for a minute; finally, put a handful of sawdust in the box and shake for another minute or so, and remove the sawdust by sifting it from the screws in a fine sieve. The screws will come out well cleaned.

WHILE digging a well about twenty miles from the Texas line in Lincoln County, N. M., Mr. J. H. Miller discovered an elephant tusk three feet long and four inches in diameter. The tusk was in a splendid state of preservation when exhumed, but after being exposed to the sun it began to crack and shell. There was in sight at last report a rib bone in the side of the well, bedded in white sand, and about twelve inches thick. A tusk has also since been dug out. Mr. Miller thinks the entire skeleton is there, as there is no signs of washed in earth or overflow.

A CURIOUS freak of electricity is reported from Cuipiancaras, in Panama. A farmer had been superintending some work in the fields and had laid his gun down near a tree. The tree was surrounded by an electric flame, which disappeared as quickly as it came. The victim's left eye was damaged, and the eyelrow was burned completely off, and the surrounding his ears, a part of his beard, and all the hair on his head and women are to be the brass buttons disappeared from his clothing. The sight also was out in two a small piece was bored through his wind-pipe, and the watch glass was shattered and the right side of his body he suffered severely, but is recovering rapidly.

An observer does some ways as an alligator's throat is an animated sewer. Everything which lodges in his open mouth goes down. He is a lazy dog, and instead of hunting for something to eat he lets his victuals hunt for him. That is, he lies with his great mouth open, apparently dead. Size has been no obstacle to the ingenuity of the

FARM AND GARDEN.

A BARREL HEADER THAT SECURELY PACKS THE FRUIT.

Detailed Instructions About Making and Keeping Cider Sweet and Sparkling—Attractive Device for Plants—Convenient Rack for Stock Cows.

A Kansas correspondent in Prairie Farmer tells how to make a rack for handling shock corn that will be appreciated by any one who has been accustomed to hunking on the ground in a cramped position.

RACK FOR HANDLING SHOCK CORN.

Make the sills or bed pieces of poles or of scantlings twelve feet long. Nail on three stiff boards about thirty inches long for cross pieces. One of these should be on the under side, and the other two on top about three feet apart; fasten on legs firmly about three feet from the ends. In using it a shock is laid across the rack, and a man or boy may stand on each side of the corn between the side pieces of the rack and throw the ears on one side and the stalks on the other. This rack is often handy to carry the fodder on when feeding it, or when putting it in larger shocks after husking.

Drying Fruit Under Hot Red Sash.

Popular Gardening suggests that owners of hot bed sash utilize these for making a sun drier for drying surplus fruit. The sash should be elevated on a frame four feet from the ground at the front and a foot higher behind. A rack with supports for drying trays at four or five inches apart should be constructed under the sash, to be reached from behind. The place of approach for sliding in or taking out the trays may be covered with fly screening, the other sides with boards. The sash will both increase the heat and keep off the dews and rains, thus allowing the drying to proceed from beginning to end speedily and with the smallest possible amount of bother.

Barreling Apples.

Barreled apples are frequently sent long distances by rail or other transportation, and the constant jolting and rough handling bruises the fruit if not securely packed. Hence it is advisable when filling barrels, at every addition of a half bushel of fruit, to gently shake the barrel, and thus secure close packing. Fill the barrel so that quite a number of apples will be above the level of the upper part, then place on the head, above which lay a bit of plank that will easily fit within the end of the barrel, and press the head to its original position by one of the many methods used for the purpose.

A BARREL HEADER.

In the cut is shown a barrel header described and recommended by Country Home. It consists, as will be seen by the cut, of a frame of sufficient dimensions to admit the barrel, which stands upon a plank platform. The pressing is performed by means of a screw, either wood or iron, passing through the upper and horizontal part of the frame.

Attractive Arrangement for Flowers.

The floral cone is a pretty ornament for the conservatory or window garden. American Garden gave recently an illustrated description of one, which is here reproduced for the benefit of our readers.

The cut shows the construction and finished effect. Four circular shelves are arranged one above another for a foundation, the diameter of the same depending upon individual taste. A convex form suitable for the cone is got by making the lower shelf 12 inches from the ground and the shelves 10 inches apart from center to center; with the stand for the pot 8 inches above the highest shelf. Allowing for a pot 6 inches high and for the plant in it to project 6 inches above it, the height of the cone will be 62 inches. For this height the lowest should be about 30 inches in diameter, the next higher, 28 inches; the next, 27 inches, and the highest, 18. The spaces between the shelves are filled with soil, much as a pot would be filled. First is a layer of coarse gravel or broken crockery and charcoal and then mold within two or three inches of the next shelf. The shelves are properly braced to bear the weight put upon them. The outer surface of the soil is made in the direction of the shelf just above, except on the lower shelf; on this the surface is perpendicular. The soil should not reach quite so far out as the periphery of the shelf that holds it. The soil is watered by inserting the long spout of a can between the soil and the shelf above it. Holes are bored around the center of each shelf, to allow the water to drain through. The lower shelf is planked in matching that will droop to the ground. Here the seeds are planted on the level surface, from the edge back three or four inches. Above this the seeds are planted not only on the level surface, but also on the inclined outer surface. Annuals are the best, and one may select to suit his own fancy.

FLORAL CONE.

Making Cider.

Numerous machines for making cider—some to be driven by steam and many to be worked by hand power—have superseded in certain sections of the country the old fashioned cider mill. These save time and labor, but for making a superior article of cider no improvement has really been made over the old time mill that slowly mashed and squeezed the apples, instead of rapidly reducing them to a pulp or grinding them to a fine pomace.

September, October and November are the cider making months, but the nearer cold weather it is produced the better the beverage will keep.

Good cider cannot be made from defective apples, and the picking up of all sorts with leaves and dirt attached for making cider cannot be too severely condemned. On the contrary, where cider not vinegar is the object, it will pay to reject all unripe and unsound apples, and wash them clean and dry them in the sun until they are a little wilted, for the more water that can be removed from them at this stage the better the cider will be. The finest table apples do not make the best cider, the preference as a cider apple being universally given to the Hughes or Virginia crabs, a small apple of a little less than twice the size of the common wild crab, not remarkable for the quantity of its juice and entirely destitute of any good edible qualities, but producing cider that will command double the price of that made from more sightly and fine flavored apples. Next comes the Hurlbut, an apple yellow in color, twice as large as the crab, whose juice so closely resembles that of the crab that where they are grown in the same orchard they are made into cider together. There are many other good cider apples, but none that surpass the crab.

Crab cider is remarkable for its sparkling qualities and spirit, rivaling champagne; for the making of the latter beverage crab cider is no longer employed. The secret of bottling crab cider consists in cleansing it from all foreign matter, even and sediment, without arresting fermentation by heating with fire, or the use of mustard or chemicals. This is done by standing it in large open casks holding three or four barrels until fermentation has begun and considerable scum has risen and been skimmed from the top, when the cider is carefully racked off through faucets placed in the casks about eight inches from the bottom so as not to draw off the sediment, and it is then sometimes strained through filters of clean sand or charcoal, when it is barreled and stored in a cool cellar ready for sale. Where one or more additional racking are given, the slow filtering may be dispensed with. Whenever the supposed fermentation going on in the liquid manifests itself so strongly as to swell out the heads, it is necessary to give the gas a temporary vent by a small gimlet hole near the bung which at once gives relief, when it may be stopped with a plug that can be easily drawn out to allow another escape of the gas when it becomes necessary. This treatment is equally applicable to cider made from other varieties of apples, but to those who prefer sweetness to sparkle and spirit, a different one is required.

There are various ways of preventing fermentation. The best, though requiring more labor than others, consists in scalding the cider in copper kettles or a large copper still that will hold three or four barrels, the scalding to stop just as boiling is about to begin, when the fire should be drawn from under the still and the liquor be placed in an open cask large enough to hold it until it becomes entirely cold, when it is drawn off in the same manner as directed for fresh cider. During the heating a great mass of fine pomace will rise to the top in the still, which should be continually skimmed off and several inches of fine sediment will remain in the bottom of the cask after the cider has grown cold. Where from fifty to 100 barrels of cider are made yearly about six of the large open casks will be wanted and should be set high enough from the ground to allow cider to run from the faucets into barrels. Other processes are the use of mustard seed or sulphate of limes seen as the cider is barrel, but whatever method is adopted to preserve it precisely as it came from the press.

Cider is better when the pomace remains over night without being pressed. Clean rye straw is the best straining material to be used in laying up the cheese, and the presses and racks should be thoroughly cleansed before using a second time. Cider should never be allowed to freeze and thaw. When from neglect it has frozen to any considerable degree it will cave down off into other barrels, leaving the ice when melted to be thrown away or used to replenish the vinegar barrels. As a compensation for the waste incurred in freezing, whether done accidentally or purposely, the cider when drawn off will be found improved to an astonishing degree by nature's own process for expelling the surplus water. Evaporating the water by boiling the cider will ruin it for a beverage. Champagne cider is quite frequently made by charging cider that is deficient in spirit and sparkle with carbonic acid gas, and manufacturers of cider who are not farmers have many methods of presenting the article to their customers in a pleasing form that are not practicable on the farm.

The New Corn Ensilage.

The latest plan with ensilage is to cut the entire corn crop—stalks, ears and all—into the silo. The kernels of the corn will be wholly digested by the cattle, as it does not dry out nor lose its milky character, which gives it a succulence for rapid digestion. A farmer who has made this point one of special investigation so reports, and affirms that there is not a visible trace of corn in the voidings.

THE KINGDOM OF STYLE.

WHAT IS TO BE FOUND WITHIN ITS PRECINCTS.

The Little Poke Bonnet so Coquettish and so Pretty—The Difficulties of Buying and the Business of Selling Things. Making Up Her Mind.

[Special Correspondence.]

NEW YORK, Oct. 6.—Head wear is particularly pleasing this season. Millinery is the early birds of trade. Their wares are on display, and there have been openings at which women elbowed each other and raved over new shapes, quite to the content of their hearts. The poke appears again. This time it is a little pake, with a brief and beautifully curving brim, becoming to many faces, and deliciously coquettish on some. It has a low crown, which is well smothered under towering trimming, which comes up behind and falls over the crown. It is a refreshing change from the military looking front trimming we have had all summer. Sometimes the crown is made full, and sometimes the velvet is put on quite plain. The brim is altered sometimes. But that adds to the weight, and velvet bonnets are heavy enough in all conscience without a wad of extra cloth wrought into them. The trimming is of feathers, birds and wings and cockades more than ostrich tips, and light colored ribbons are knotted in with velvet.

"But there is an Audubon society," says some lady with a tender heart, "and its mission is to discourage the slaughter of birds." Yes, I know, and all who feel that way should join it and live up to its laws. But let them also be consistent and fix up a society for the protection of the poor seal, the fox, the Persian lamb and all the other animals whose fur is used for cloaking them and trimming their garments. When I buy a bird for my hat I always console myself with the thought that it probably died a natural death, and that it is a compliment to its beauty to wear it as an ornament, sometimes I go further and think of the much longer it has probably enjoyed.

But to return to the little poke. I give a picture of one. This shape is to be found in velvet, all ready to trim, for $4. In felt it is the same price. Other shapes are numerous and many are beautiful. Altogether I think that the head-wear on draughts just now is pleasing. A black velvet poke with a full, fluffy crown, a band of gold braid around the crown and some natty feathers at the rear struck my fancy and I asked the price. It was $14. There is an attempt to get the crowns "down a peg," but the lowers have obtained so great headway that it is doubtful if it is succeeding for another year. After a long run of high millinery prices it is hard to realize that low crowns can have any style about them.

POKE BONNET.

Stiff silk felts are numerous and quite freakish as to shape. The shops have been full of plushes, going off as the ruinous rate of eighty-seven and ninety-seven cents a yard. All the colors and shades of color are represented, and women are buying them up greedily. The bright ones are lovely for house gowns, and the darker shades are lovely for street gowns. For instance, the copper color. This color is popular in all materials, but in plush it is exquisite. There are lovely short wraps of this color, and it is put with black often, making a new and happy combination. Black is greatly mixed with colors, which heretofore were considered its mortal enemies. It is found woven with the different shades of browns, also the greens and brick color, and the blues, too.

Wool gowns are now in their glory. And such wool! The looms of the fairies have surely been busy. Passementerie and braiding are on everything, and their beauty and durability were never before achieved. The mixed cloth cloaks are nearly all elaborately braided, and always in contrasting colors. I saw a young lady trying on a jacket of blue broadcloth cloth three days ago. It was braided with fine braid almost all over the front and quite deep around the bottom, and it fitted her slender figure like a tight glove. Its cost was $42. She wanted it in black, but she did not feel like paying that price, for, mind you, she belongs to the class of artists, and, as a rule, they are not rolling in wealth. And then she knew that whatever outer garment she bought now she must stick to all winter, and this, though wonderfully becoming, was so thin that she foresaw neuralgia and possibly pneumonia waiting for her in the dead of winter if she bought it. There was a struggle, and she went away without it. But yesterday I met her and she had it on. She had gone back after it, she said, and now her mind was settled and there could be no vacillating or vacillating over this one or that one. She tripped away comfortable in the jaunty little thing, but the day of reckoning is to be reached nevertheless. You her mind is settled, and it is not impossible that she, too, will be settled in her grave before the birds sing again. She coupled as she tripped away in the coveted garment. Garment! Yes, that is the word in consideration when the saleswomen in regard to wraps. "This is a superior garment!" "That is a very fine garment!" "There is not a better garment in the store!" and, "Here, Cash, go upstairs and tell them to send Mrs. Markham the garment down immediately," are some of the sentences that float about the cloak room. Many a purchaser is spurred on to buying garments that will never be of any use to her in the world by the wily tongues of the saleswomen.

The silk whose claim to favor was that it "could stand alone," has had its day. Nobody wears stiff, rustling silk now. Everything must be soft and drape nicely. House dresses of soft silks and soft laces are much in demand.

Lace plaids are plentiful—in the stores, both in dress goods and ragians. But the wary and wise one is careful about going into them. They have a faculty of making themselves hated before long.

In plush for wraps black is more of a favorite than brown. Red, green and yellow brown will also be much bought.

White flannel as a home dress is likely to be in the front rank all winter.

Tucking is a favorite form of trimming for flannel and soft cloth round skirts.

Did I tell you that black beaists and hats are very fashionable, and isn't it a good thing? Black can be flung on with anything.

Home costumes are very brilliant.

Old fashioned ear bobs are the rage for arm to the theatre or to a ball are again on hand. They are useful for gloves, powder box, handkerchief, etc.

NAOMI TRENT.

What am I to Do?

The symptoms of Biliousness are unhappily too well known. They differ in different sufferers, sometimes in some extent. A bilious man is seldom a breakfast eater. Too frequently, already, he has an excellent appetite for liquids but none for solids of a morning. His tongue will hardly have incrustation at any time; if it is foul, warm and furred, it is rough at all events.

The digestive system is always out of order and diarrhœa or Constipation may be a symptom or the two may alternate. There are often Headaches and dizziness, sometimes there is sickliness and often headache and acidity or flatulence and tenderness in the pit of the stomach. To correct all this if not effect a cure try, Green's August Flower, it costs but a trifle and thousands attest its efficacy. 2TNOW

The Keys.—The kidneys and liver are the keys to a woman's health. If these organs are in a healthy condition no four years need be entertained of sickness, for the system will cleanse itself of impure matter. If you have Dyspepsia, constipation, loss of appetite, lame back or side, failing strength, irregular or excessive flow of the menses, remember they are the advance guard, and give warning to more serious mischief, such as Bright's disease, &c. Parmelee's Dyspepsin, Diabetes, Kidney and Liver Cure is a sure cure for all these ailments. Price only $1 large bottle. Sold by Dr. Crouter.

Worth Knowing.

Mr. W. H. Morgan, merchant, Lake City, Fla., was taken with a severe cold, attended with a distressing cough and running into consumption in its first stages. He tried many so-called popular cough remedies and steadily grew worse. Was reduced in flesh, had difficulty in breathing, and was unable to sleep. Finally tried Dr. King's N ew discovery for Consumption, and found immediate relief, and after using half a half dozen bottles found himself well, and has had no return of the disease. No other remedy can claim such a record of cures as Dr. King's New discovery for Consumption. Guaranteed to do just what is claimed for it. Trial bottles free at Dr. Crouter's drug store. 1

Effects of Heredity.

A new method of obtaining data for estimating the effects of heredity has been recently devised. Starting from a brood of a single pair of moths, Francis Galton proposes to get the data from some one characteristic, such as length of wing, during several successive generations. In each generation three lines of descent, those of shortest, longest and medium length of wing, will be continued.—Chicago Times.

Renews Her Youth.

Mrs. Phoebe Cheney, Newcomb, Clay Co. Iowa, tells the following remarkable story, the truth of which she will testify to by residents of Clayton: "I am 75 years old, have been troubled with kidney complaint and bameness for many years! could not dress myself without help. Now I am free from all pain and soreness, and am able to do all my own housework. I owe my thanks to Electric Bitters for having renewed my youth, and removed completely all disease and pain." LYNCHED AT MIDNIGHT.

The Supposed Murderer of Luella Mabbitt Hanged by a Mob in Indiana.

A MOB of 200 men surrounded the jail at Delphi, Ind., and made a demand for Amer Green, confined there on the charge of murdering Luella Mabbitt. Green went out walking with Miss Mabbitt one evening in August, 1896, and the young lady was never seen alive afterward, a body found in the Wabash river, near Lafayette, in the following February being identified as hers, and a Coroner's jury pronounced Green her murderer. The man, after being refused the keys of the jail by the Sheriff, battered in the door with a sledge, and was soon encountered Green. The prisoner, who had preserved his coolness during the assault on the door, now pleaded piteously for mercy. His prayers were disregarded, and though he attempted to defend himself with a piece of piping hastily wrenched from the wall, he was speedily overpowered, placed in a wagon, and driven away. The mob, in wagons and on foot, and greatly swelled by this time, started over the bridge and headed for Walnut Grove. The report was soon afterward received that the purpose of the avengers had been carried out. When the sun rose the following morning it disclosed the body of Amer Green hanging in the woods eight miles southeast of Delphi.

THE ANARCHIST APPEAL.

The Case Before the Supreme Court.

A WASHINGTON special of Sunday says: The Supreme Court met yesterday afternoon in consultation, and took up the application made yesterday by the counsel of the condemned anarchists. The consultation was not a long one, but the agreement was reached that the critical moment at which the appeal could be argued would be Thursday next. That will afford the State time to send its representatives here to be prepared to answer the arguments of Messrs. Butler, Pryor, Black and Tucker. As soon as the court had reached its decision word was conveyed to the defendant counsel, and the clerk of the court was instructed to notify Attorney General Hunt to order that he may be heard. The general opinion among lawyers here is that the case, as presented by Messrs. Pryor for the condemned, is a weak one; that as presented it was wrapped up in a great deal of language that will be easily stripped off, and that the only point really to be decided is as to the constitutionality of the Illinois jury law."

MURDERED IN COLD BLOOD.

Perry Ackers, with Destruction in His Heart, Drowns a Town in Gore.

A DES MOINES dispatch gives particulars of a shocking tragedy at Maxwell, Story County, Iowa:

It appears that Perry Ackers, who committed the bloody murder, started out last evening about five o'clock, been on destroying some body. He borrowed a revolver from a neighbor on the pretense that he was going after a dog, but he went straight to the office of Justice Hiram Cole, walked in and, asking him if he was ready to take his medicine, admitted the charge without further explanation, shooting him in the left lower jaw, the ball lodging down and out by the shoulder blade. He then entered the office of Dr. Lyons, who, not realizing he meant him harm, took him in and gave him an hour's rest. The murderer then passed into the street, where he crossed paths with Mr. Cole, who was crippled by his first shot, and, with the coolness and deliberation of a fiend, shot him in the left lower jaw, the ball lodging down and out by the shoulder blade. He then entered the office of Dr. Lyons, that standing empty and being used as a hitching post, and, with an aim to kill, fired a second shot, lodging in the neck. The murderer then passed into the entrance to the Odd Fellows' Hall, as well as the office of the Justice, on the way, reaching that place about 7:30 o'clock, and, passing on to Ballinger's place of business, he was met by the proprietor, who had been for some time an object of suspicion, but no one suspected any such startling tragedy as came.

HOME AGAIN.

The Presidential Party Return to Washington in Safety.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND and party reached Washington, on Sunday, the 23d inst. The President expressed himself as heartily glad to get home, though as heartily glad that he went away. During the three weeks of his journey he traveled forty-five hundred miles, passed his birthday in Indianapolis—crossing three of Sunday's seventeen hours—and was seen by several hundred thousand citizens. There were a millions of Americans citizens. There were a million in Washington, and it is nothing of unpleasantness to the people whom the President has visited to say that every one of the tourists was glad of it. After breakfast the President and Mrs. Cleveland drove out to their country home at Oak View, where they spent the day.

Death of Hon. E. B. Washburne.

ELIHU B. WASHBURNE, ex-Minister to France, died of congestion of the heart at the residence of his son in Chicago. He had been ill for some month. His death was sudden and painless.

Minor Telegrams.

THE re-election of President Diaz is looked upon as certain in Mexico.

SIR RACHE COXARD claims that his agent, Charles G. Francklyn, whom he has had outlawed in jail in New York City, is in arrears in his accounts to the amount of $9,000,000. Francklyn's counsel insist that the men were jointly interested in business ventures in this country, and that Sir Rache is now attempting to escape his share of the losses incurred.

THE EASTERN STATES.

DIPTHERIA is raging in such an extent at Ramapo, N. Y., that it has been necessary to close the public schools.

WILLIAM WALKER, an importer of dress trimmings at New York, has made an assignment. His liabilities are about $125,000, and his assets $100,000.

LAWYER J. A. LANCEY, of New York, counsel for the Kansas Pacific consolidated bondholders who have begun a suit against Jay Gould and Russell Sage for $6,000,000, says that criminal prosecutions will also be begun against Gould and Sage under the provisions of the penal code in relation to trustees. He has requested the Pacific Investigation Committee to furnish him with a record of their proceedings, but Commissioner Anderson has replied that the act establishing the commission provides that the evidence or testimony taken before it shall not be used against the person so testifying on the trial of any criminal proceeding."

FRANZ MEMMY, one of the band of anarchists who have been setting fire to insured houses, their reward being a commission from the owners, has been convicted at New York. William Scharf, the leader of the incendiaries, has escaped.

WOODMAN, TRUE & CO., jobbers in dry goods, Portland, Me., have made an assignment. The liabilities are stated at about $350,000. The stock of goods on hand is valued at about $135,000.

THE WESTERN STATES.

THE Cherokee Nation is terrorized by a band of desperadoes who are robbing and burning houses with impunity.

A MIRACLE from Marinette, Wis., says: This city was visited by a most destructive fire Friday morning; in fact, the worst that ever visited the city. It broke out about 1 o'clock in Charles Reinecke's grocery on Main street, and spread so rapidly that before it could be gotten under control over forty buildings were destroyed, sweeping away an entire block on one side of the street and two blocks upon the other. The scene of the fire is what was the thickest business portion of the city, and comprised many wooden buildings, which, with their contents, served to spread the flames rapidly. The loss will probably reach $200,000. With but few exceptions, the firm burned out saved most of their stocks of goods except the fixtures, and some of them were already making arrangements to open again. There is every evidence that the fire was of incendiary origin.

A FARGO (Dak.) special says: "Every train that comes in is crowded with men to file claims on the Northern Pacific Railway limit. The streets are thronged with people and the hotels are crowded. About fifteen hundred strangers are in the city. Some skepticism is entertained as to the value of these filings, but the chance of winning valuable lands is a sufficient inducement."

THE Excelsior Refining Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, has made an assignment. The assets are estimated at $75,000; liabilities not given.

FIRE at San Francisco destroyed the Felton Iron Works (loss, $200,000), and the California Car Works (loss, about $50,000). The structures were well insured.

LARGE number of Swedish colliers are being taken into the mines in the Springfield, Ill., district, and the strikers there are liable to rise against them. The situation is serious.

IT is estimated the yield of wheat in Michigan will reach 22,815,152 bushels. Potatoes are about one-third crop; winter apples come half a average crop.

THE SOUTHERN STATES.

THE President and his party were received by Governor Gordon in the Capitol in Atlanta, Ga., on Tuesday, and were then driven to the auditorium grounds at Piedmont Park, where an address of welcome was delivered by H. H. Gray, to which the President responded. He sketched the rapid growth and prosperity of Atlanta, and in conclusion said:

Every man at all conversant in what is here exhibited will return to his home with new pride in his property; and the aggregate of this pride will make a rich and prosperous neighborhood. All combinations have their origin in some single thing; in fact, all of these friends around me have come together to-day because of the fertility of the soil, or of its adaptability to the enterprise of its people. Imagination sees a population here, where they may meet and take counsel and help each other. All of the great interests represented still feel the impulse of the cotton exposition. It was the most successful commercial convention of 1895, and I trust that the Piedmont exhibition may prove of as great benefit as these to the material welfare of the State, the section of country which has contributed to its success.

At the conclusion of the President's speech repeated calls were made for Governor Gordon. In response, the Governor arose and proposed "three cheers for Mrs. Cleveland," which were given with great enthusiasm.

TELEGRAPH (W. Va.) dispatch: "In Boone County, West Virginia, Jake Coon and Robert Ryan were shot down as barns, participators in the murder of the Rev. Thomas F. Ryan, and were lynched. Vigilantes also captured and hanged George Daft, Jr., brother of Robert. William Drake was taken by a mob to Spencer, and it is not known whether he was lynched. Drake confessed that Dan Cunningham, a detective, planned the robbery and that the gang carried out the scheme."

LATER.—A Charleston (W. Va.) dispatch states: "Cunningham has been caught and lynched, and the vigilantes will not let up until half a dozen or so more outlaws have been hanged."

A STORM in Louisiana is reported to have destroyed almost all the sugar-cane between Morgan City and New Orleans. In the latter city houses, fences, and trees were blown down, and many of the streets were inundated.

A DISPATCH from Charleston, W. Va., gives the following particulars of a serious wreck to a fast express on the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad:

As coaches going west, met with an accident, twelve miles below this city, in which twenty-five passengers were more or less injured. None were killed outright, but several were very badly injured. The accident was caused by a broken wheel. The engine passed safely, baggage, mail and express cars all well filled with passengers, when the first coach, the ladies' coach, was found turned completely over, one turn from the track, and dragging. The train was going twelve miles an hour, or thereabouts, when the coach gave out in the shoes, or shoes of the wheel, which, with the axle, the coach is attached to the engine, and the company is doing all in its power to care for the injured, many of whom were able to continue their journey.

AN immense crowd was assembled in Montgomery, Ala., to greet the Chief Magistrate and his party on their arrival in that city on Thursday. The Presidential party breakfasted at the hotel with Governor and Mrs. Seay, Colonel and Mrs. Newman, Mayor Reese and daughter, ex-Governor O'Neil, Senator Pugh, Senator Morgan, and a few others, after which they reviewed the troops from the balcony of the hotel. Mrs. Cleveland was the surprised recipient of a unique and beautiful souvenir from the Mayor and City Council. It is a gold silver loving cup, made in the form of a bale of cotton, about eight inches in length and proportionate in depth and width.

THE NATIONAL CAPITAL.

OF the $14,000,000 of bonds which the Government offered on Sept. 23d to buy for the sinking fund, $8,000,000 had been already purchased up to the 20th.

UNITED STATES COMMISSIONER EDGERTON, says a Washington telegram:

He is 77 years of age, and, of course, his sentiments are governed by the circumstances of his recent letter against the assumption of government circles organized State associations and taking part in political affairs. Judge Edgerton doubtless believes in extreme or straitlaced constructions of the law, which would anpublish to full extent the decision of the Supreme Court by extreme constructions. These State organizations, said Judge Edgerton, "have no right to exist as they exist. They are as much right to exist as they exist. A man is not deprived of his citizenship because he accepts a position in public office, and I think the idea that a non-official standing his residence in a State—his citizenship—when he takes office in Washington is preposterous. I think it is to be construed in this extreme manner, it will array the Government against it."

In order to expedite matters, Justice Harlan, of the United States Supreme Court, on Friday, Oct. 21, refused to consider the application for a writ of error in the anarchist case alone, but directed counsel to bring the matter before the entire bench in open court by General Pryor, who stated the points upon which he relied to show that the case involved Federal questions.

After recapitulating the history of the case Mr. Pryor said he would call the attention of the court to only two points which he relied upon to show that the case at the bar presented Federal questions, and that such tribunal was empowered thus court to take jurisdiction of and to grant the relief prayed for. The first point was that the jury by which the prisoners were tried, was not a jury such as Congress passed in March, 1874, to alter the objection of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution—a law to regulate such juries in the Federal courts. The second point was that the objection had been made up in part, at least, of jurors who had formed and expressed an opinion as to the innocence of the persons accused of the crime charged against them, and, in fact, that one man who made it expressly on the ground that he had formed an opinion as to the guilt of the accused, and, under law, he could excuse by strong evidence, the presumption of bias, which, in these cases under consideration, had the jurisdiction and power to grant the relief given to it in the courts below had formed them of their lives which was about to deprive them of their lives without due process of law, which was the Federal Constitution. The Third Justice Harlan said was the only question for this court to consider was whether the Court erred in its administration of the State law. The question for the State court was the construction of the State law. If the statute was taken from the State of Illinois, Mr. Pryor's second point was that the constitutional amendment was intended to protect citizens of the State against the injustice of juries of a hostile sort, and to secure to the accused a fair trial by an impartial jury. Yet the provisions still show their origin, for all the jurisdiction included and all the provisions were made for the benefit of the accused, and the language of business in Germany, and in the United States are Slavic.

As you get further on into Russia the long stretch of the country people show that you have come into the land of mud and hard roads. All along the line you see that monotonous beauty of every northern landscape, the wild, thick-grown forests, in which pines and birch strive for the mastery; the silge, the stretches of rolling land, large and more, and deep, soft, marsh meadows roughly raised with ditches, the little villages with their thatched roofs, the stranger from the west of Europe is amazed at the size of the country where every tree is not numbered; where there is room for the whole nation; where it is cheaper and easier to make a fresh road over a new site than to repair the ruts of the old track. But when the sun goes down behind a hill, and throws a long light on the foliage of the wood opposite—a foliage not of a dusky blue-green, but of the bright pines relieved by the lightest, freshest green, the green of the leaves and twigs that shine outside on the silver birch stems and the surface of the quiet river turns to gold, the feeling of the Russian sunset as portrayed by Turgeniff with a glamour over the beauty of the landscape not seen often in stage land. There is time to forget the train, where there is another palace, and then the line, skirting the last lake, comes into view, in which St. Petersburg is built. FROM BERLIN TO ST. PETERSBURG.

It is forty hours in the train from Berlin to St. Petersburg. Until you have traveled right through it you hardly realize the greatness of Prussia. From the French frontier to Berlin is a shorter distance than from Berlin to Tyttenhof, on the Russian frontier, and the whole road runs through well-tilled fields, well-cultivated meadows, in which shapely cattle graze, and past well-kept forests, houses with roomy stock yards, testimonies of thrift to the orderly, economical North German spirit.

The Russian railway gauge is different from the Prussian, so while changing trains at Edytkuhnen one has to wait two hours; lower, the portriages are delicious, and they are provided at every Russian railway restaurant. On first crossing the frontier you see but little difference, for you pass through Russia's German provinces in the Provinces were in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries conquered from the pagan Prussians by the Teutonic Knights in religious order of similar constitution to the Knights Templars, and to them colonized by German merchants; and the country growing wealthy and prosperous, the men who had formed an opinion as to the guilt of the accused, under law, could be excused by strong evidence, the presumption of bias, which, in these cases under consideration, had the jurisdiction and power to grant the effect given to it in the courts below had formed them of their lives which was about to deprive them of their lives without due process of law, which was the Federal Constitution. Leather Coleage.

In the year 1123 Domenico Michieli, the Doge, fitted out a Bucentaurk a crusade in Syria and Palestine, routed the Saracens and conquered Tyre in 1124. There the Doge found himself greatly embarrassed for want of money, for the crusted supplies had not arrived, and the Venetian troops (mercenaries for the most part) clamored for immediate payment under the threat of wholesale desertion. The Doge consulted Michieli, ordered a large number of pieces of leather to be stamped with the pounds of his sword, the Venetian money and coat of arms were engraved, adding the number of pounds which was intended to represent. And behold, the money lender in Jerusalem had no respect for the Doge and his honesty, and so great faith in the credit of the Venetian Doge, that he gave the required amount on the security of those pieces of leather which were made into currency under the name of "Michieletti." They were afterward redeemed in full by the Venetian Senate, and at a later period added to the coat-of-arms of the Venetian nobility.

THE POREIGN BUDGET.

A SPECIAL cable dispatch from London to the Chicago Tribune says:

Mr. Hanna has now been in Paris for two weeks. Many of his friends who have seen him there, as well as those who have met him in Germany, have been informed through London that he is likely to remain there some time. Many things, in fact, that all these friends have gathered from Mr. Hanna's own lips have gone to bolster up the impression that he does not desire to be nominated for President. Indeed, he does not desire to be nominated, he has said, and he does not intend to be candidate, if asked, however, whether they speak authoritatively or not, Mr. Hanna's friends here do not give their impression with great confidence. Mr. Hanna's friends say that he is charged with a deliberate intention to kill O'Brien, and report has it that for a second offense against the coercion act on the part of any one the police have been instructed to shoot to kill.

Meanwhile, there was the greatest excitement, and the belief was that if the coercion act was not suspended, there would be a close will fill graves with the inclitors to think, to the end prove to be just what was thought by Mr. W. E. Gladstone. Speaking from D. A. at, New York, said: "The majority of the Eastern delegates will be for a large or cordially well pleased, and in the order in the East from the Mississippi River, and will be for the entire organization all over the country very much short."

GENERAL MEADE IN BRONZE.

A PHILADELPHIA dispatch of Wednesday says that—

In the presence of a large concourse of people, Meade Square was thronged many of Philadelphia's most prominent citizens and distinguished public men of the State and nation, the bronze equestrian statue of General George Gordon Meade, erected in memory of the great soldier, was unveiled with appropriate ceremonies. The most impressive demonstrations of the kind ever given in this city, formed an

STATUE OF GEN. MEADE.

Broad and Spring Garden streets and another thousand people were there the unveiling, ceremonies the statue, which is a magnificent work of art, is in the shape of a bronze equestrian figure, the horse in the act of rearing, standing on a bed of bronze size, and is mounted on a pedestal of Maine granite, which is twenty-five feet high. The statue represents General Meade riding at the head of his troops in the battle of Gettysburg. The design is a spirited one, and the likeness is striking.

If they are allowed to get out of order, there should be accumulations of dirt and grease they will lose all sensitiveness and be of no longer any control the speed of the engine. The foundation of a steam-gauge is in the whole; get rid of the bats and other refuse brick that may have accumulated. Is it the fault of the boiler inspectors very closely, and see that they do not put up a kind of material in the chimney that will fall and crush you. Boilers do not improve by standing idle. They need to be kept lightly. An idle boiler, like an idle man, soon wears out. Steam boilers should not be used to cut the scale off from a boiler sheet. You will cut the plate and do more harm than good. Use a light hammer. A belt that is slipping and refusing to do work is of that is yet known, it can be made to act all right if the pulleys are made to run true. Belts are larger, over which it runs are sometimes lost. Belts should not stick open can be closed by a slight tap of the hammer. The belt should be used to put

THE Salt Lake News declares that the constitution of the United States was inspired of God.

THE protection theory: The heavier taxes you pay, the faster you will get rich. The free trade theory: The lighter your taxes the more you will have left.

THE pernicious protective system protects the rich man and holds the nose of the toiler hard down against the grindstone of poverty.—Philadelphia Record.

THE revenue cutter Richard Rush, which arrived in San Francisco lately from the arctic regions, reported that during the season she had seized twelve sealing vessels with a total of nearly 7,000 skins.

As the end of Mr. Cleveland's first term draws near the conclusion forces itself on public notice that his administration has been attended by no public calamity, but by a generally improved fiscal and political feeling.—Kalamazoo Gazette.

BEN BUTLER has a great deal of sympathy for the Chicago anarchists, but it is fortunate for them that they can pay him a big retaining fee and $250 a day. If it had been otherwise they could not have applied his sympathy to any useful purpose.—Chicago News.

The tender regard for the lives of even condemned men which the law always manifests is in strong distinction to the unreasoning cruelty of the anarchists, who proposed to kill without trial all who were opposed to their insane and brutal policy.—Chicago News.

READ the list of necessary articles on which the tariff duty imposed is over fifty per cent. Those taxes constantly gnaw at the very heart of thrift among the people of all conditions of life who support themselves or are supported by daily labor.—Philadelphia Record.

THERE are more Union veterans in the employ of the government at Washington under this democratic administration than there ever were under any republican administration. Of course republican papers can't spare space to give their readers items like this.—Boston Globe.

THE more progress he makes in his southern journey the more enthusiastic are the greetings the president receives. This is one country and one people, and the malignant little fellows that are trying to make the fact appear otherwise are succeeding in making themselves ridiculous.—Troy Press.

INSTEAD of devising means to deposit the surplus with banks so they may loan it to the people, the true way is to so legislate as to make such an accumulation impossible. Prevention, not distribution, is what ought to engage the attention of legislators and newspapers both.—Washington Post.

PROTECTION ingeniously so arranges things that the people may be taxed while the government treasury receives no money. It does this by raising the rate of duty, thus shutting out foreign competition, and then enabling the home manufacturers to combine and put up the price by arrangement in a way that shall increase the cost to purchasers the cost of what they make, the people paying the enhanced cost, while the government gets not a dollar from the operation.—Boston Herald.

ALLEN G. THURMAN addressed an immense mass meeting at Canton O., Saturday evening. In the course of his remarks he referred to the president in the following terms: "I want to speak of a man I know—Grover Cleveland. I have lived through a good many presidential terms. I have known several presidents personally. I have read the history of all the administrations, and I say upon my honor as a man, bound to tell you the truth as faithfully as ever man told the truth, that a more honest, braver, truer man never filled the presidential chair. I say he is an honest plain man, of far more ability than the people generally think. He has that supreme family, common sense. If he is not a level-headed, honest man I am no judge of men. He grows in the popular favor every day, and when the four years of his administration are at an end the people will say: 'you have done well; you may take your seat for another four years.'"

THE consolidation of the Baltimore and Ohio wires with the Western Union system will, in all likelihood, be followed by an effort to establish a postal telegraph and persuade the government to buy the existing lines. We have no hesitation in saying that the purchase of the property at anything like its capitalized value would be one of the heaviest transactions in water privileges on record.—Philadelphia Press.

About 80,000 Germans have landed on these shores during the past nine months. About 60,000 Swedes, 63,000 Irish, 40,000 Italians, 18,000 Highland laddies, 21,000 Russians, 65,000 from England and Wales. And enough from other lands to swell the total to 411,000, being an increase of 116,405 over the same period last year. In September there arrived in this country 48,161 immigrants. And there's more to follow.

Edward Harrison was tried, convicted and sentenced to three years at Jackson, in the circuit court today for whipping his wife. One act consisted in taking his wife and daughter by the hair and pounding their faces on the floor. Then he took a double-barrelled gun and kept the police at bay. Judge Mills, in sentencing him, gave him a plain talk and reminded him that he belonged to an honorable fraternity that taught him better.

THE people have seen the president and the president has seen the people. Each way profit by the opportunity. The people have seen an honest, conscientious public servant doing what he can to discharge the trust devolved upon him. The president sees in the manifest enthusiasm upringing from all sections that there are no longer geographical parties in the Union; that the American people are first, last and always American.—New York Herald.

BROTHER EVARTS says the republican is the best anti-poverty society. Well that is so from several points of view. Some brothers became wealthy out of a little institution called the government whiskey ring. The star route ring was one of the most remarkable anti-poverty institutions the country ever knew. Oh, yes! Brother Evarts is right. There is no anti-poverty society like that which is made up of the leaders of the republican party.—N. Y. Graphic.
